JOURNEY THROUGH THE ENDLESS POSSIBILITIES OF METAPHOR

Metaphors are fine if they aid understanding, but sometimes they get in the way.

Coaching – The Mystic Masala

Coaching is unlocking a person's potential to maximize their growth

-John Whitmore

Being a traveller and foodie at heart; I see a host of life lessons bubble to the surface as I drive to different locales and eat diverse foods. When I signed up for a recent course in Coaching, little did I realise that this too was a travel expedition. The only difference being – an exploratory journey inwards.

I entered the class with a drive to acquire skills and tools and coach 'the right way'. The first class began with the following lines -

Who you are is how you Coach
Who you are is how you lead
How you lead is who you are

I smelt the coffee!! The journey begins with myself! The above lines rested on the fulcrum of self-awareness – being watchful of my thoughts, emotions, pain, and pleasures. Knowing what triggers me and what brings the best out in me- my strengths, development areas and what stops me! Awareness Vs Judgement creates Choices and possibilities both for me and the Coachee!!

Being the foodie I am, the closest analogy that springs to my mind is that of a Masala (spice) Box! To a tourist, this may appear to be a mere vessel holding a potpourri of masalas. Be not mislead by the simplicity of that thought. For a Chef (Coachee), the box (Coach) is the singular force that keeps all the melee of spices and flavours together. There is no judgement. There is acceptance & awareness of their unique composition and flavours (thoughts, passions, pain, experiences, desires...what have you!); coupled with the multitude of possibilities that can emerge by their collective presence and flavours being brought together. There are no right and wrong combinations – Just a catalyst for different flavours (answers)!

The next class brought a new Tadka (tempering). People are driven by a Purpose they are yet to define. Meet your Coachee where your coachee is.

Become a conduit for learning and not a giver of learning!! This backdrop led to an intense discussion on the responsibility to a coachee – namely, creation of a safe environment to interact and connect while unveiling their innermost abilities!

Pray! Isn't this yet again what the Masala Box does for a Chef! It meets the connoisseur where he is. There is no imposition of singular right and wrong combinations! It's a safe zone as the Chef peers into the box; all he responds to is 'What Else'! (Incidentally a great exploratory question to unveil solutions and abilities that the coachee has yet to discover). The answers lie within - a pinch of salt, a drizzle of oil and a dash of pepper. There are no absolutes!! Similarly every coaching discussion is an exploratory journey – a different flavour for everyone! Where there are absolutes -– always, never, precisely, exactly – Beware! There are assumptions – Steer clear!

Just as a Chef whips up culinary delights with the Masala Box of sentiments he brings together, so also a Coaching Program is built on the belief that an individual has solutions within their own being. The Coach only facilitates the individual unleash their own capability.

Our cohort was now standing at the threshold of commencing mock coaching sessions. As we primed ourselves for the session to begin, we were introduced to Kokum! Yes – let's not begin the debate – it is a fruit -but it is a masala too! It lends its tangy, tarty and salty flavours to the foods it is added to. You guessed right – the session was on the Coaching principles:

1. People are ok the way they are
2. People have all the resources with them
3. People make the best possible choices considering the situation they were in, they are in and they will be in. The resources they had, have and will have and the awareness they had, have and will have.
4. Every behaviour has a positive intention

Change is inevitable

Every member of the cohort ended the session with at least one principle that we did not resonate with fully and completely. Yes – it was a heated discussion...just like the running debate of whether Kokum is a fruit or Spice!

We are all work in progress - Who I become in this journey is 100% my responsibility! Let's become the Masala Box – the catalyst that empowers the Chef by being present. By asking 'What else'. After all the quality of life depends on the quality of questions you ask from yourself or from the other person.

I wrap up my freewheeling thoughts with a tangy twist to one of my favourite quotes on Coaching from a podcast by David Clutterbuck.

David Clutterbuck – "I think at the moment, we stop thinking of Coaching as a process and start thinking of coaching as a conversation filled with experimentation. Then we start to become a real Coach"…. may I add Real Chefs! (After all 'Who you are is how you Coach').

Coaching Metaphor: Dance Concert

As an HR Professional, I wanted to learn how to coach to guide employees reach their full potential and to hold difficult and constructive conversations. I went into learning coaching with the objective to understand:

- What coaching is
- The framework and tools of coaching
- How to best coach others to help them reach their full potential

2 weeks into my training I had a completely different awareness about what coaching is and most importantly the learning to work within When we were asked to think of our metaphor of coaching, I was trying to reflect on my learnings about the principles of coaching and drawing similarities with my experiences.

Given my reflections and understanding of coaching, my metaphor for coaching is a dance concert. In my view this serves as a powerful metaphor for coaching. Just as a dancer would move to the rhythm of the music, individuals navigating their growth find their own beats guided by the support of the coach.

In the dance concert the dance floor represents a safe space for personal expression. It is a place where individuals can express themselves freely away from the judgement of the outside world. Similarly in coaching the relationship between coach and client creates a trusting and safe environment. This safe space allows individuals to explore their thoughts, feelings and aspirations without the fear of being judged. Just as one would feel free to move to music in the dance concert, clients can delve into their inner selves understanding more of what holds them back and what drives them.

Music is the heartbeat of any dance concert as it sets the mood or tone of performance. In the scope of coaching, music can be seen as the tools, techniques and strategies that a coach employs to resonate with client. Just as the different beats and tempo of music evoke emotions and movements, asking the right powerful questions and using different coaching strategies can help the coachee have different responses and revelations. Much like the DJ listens to the audience's energy, a coach must listen to the coachee and meet the coachee where the coachee is. The key for the coach is to adapt their music to the clients needs ensuring that they find their rhythm in the process.

Light shows are a key part of the concert experience as it enhances the ambience and engages the dancer visually creating an immersive experience. Similarly, through compassionate curiosity, active listening and powerful questioning, the coach illuminates the path for the coachee, which helps the coachee find or discover the paths that may not have been visible to them.

Overall, a dance concert is an experience for self-expression and personal transformation through music, dance and immersive environment. Similarly coaching is an experience that facilitates shift in perspective, growth and transformation.

Coaching Metaphor "Torchlight"

Metaphors typically act as a bridge between a source, which is concrete, and a target, which is more abstract or is less familiar. It is this which makes them so powerful as a tool in coaching, as the coachee too is struggling to move from their current concrete reality to the uncertain future.

> "A coach is someone who tells you what you don't want to hear, who has you see what you don't want to see, so you can be who you have always known you could be"
> -Tom Landry.

This quote means that a good coach will be honest with you, even when it is difficult to hear, and will push you to confront areas of weakness or discomfort in order to help you reach your full potential, which may already subconsciously you are aware within you.

Imagine walking in a deep dark jungle on a new moon night in the pitch darkened path with a torchlight. It doesn't' show you the entire journey all at once, but it gives you the courage to take the next steps safely. The most important part of the torchlight is he/she/they are the ones who are using the torch and the journey is theirs alone. Think of torchlight a shining light on your goals ambitions and areas that you want to explore.

Torchlight will create a mental image symbolically to the coachee that the approach coach has taken will help them to see a breakthrough. This can help the coachee shift the perspective and move from the feeling "stuck in a rut" to feeling "set free from the chains".

When the coachee tells that they can "see the light at the end of the tunnel", that is what they are experiencing. There is a light for them, and they are in a tunnel. They will unconsciously 'know' much more about their situation from this metaphoric viewpoint.

The focus or the torchlight is always on the other person. Torchlight will illuminate the guiding path of coachee and the coach while being detached and having a curiosity like a child, by way of gift of powerful and impactful questions can help the coachee to connect their soul, values, beliefs and personality.

Coach will shine a Torchlight on coachee goals to help them focus on what 's ahead for them. Coach would have to walk for coachee their path by providing perspectives, options and help them make an action plan which the coachee will be curiously motivated and accountable.

This journey of self-discovery can lead to some profound changes. Through the illumination of the torchlight coachee will be able to align their values and goals, make a better decision and lead a life that is more meaningful and authentic to them.

Torch light will also help to take a look at things that coachee sometimes wanted to avoid- the challenges and obstacles that might come up along the way. It would help the coachee through the journey – providing focus, accountability and motivation until they come out on the other side.

Torchlight metaphor can be a powerful conduit in Shifting the perspectives of the coachee, gaining clarity, helping in making a positive change in the behavior in the lives of the coachee while developing an action plan.

The International Coaching Federation (ICF) defines coaching as "partnering in a thought-provoking and creative process that inspires a person to maximize their personal and professional potential."

In conclusion "Torchlight" metaphor will enable fresh insights into the conversation, reflecting coachee' s identity while giving a sense of belonging and through the unique interaction making the coachee being prepared for the future in advance.

Metaphor – The GPS

COACHING IS LIKE A GPS WHERE COACHING CAN GUIDE THE COACHEE TO REACH THEIR DESTINATION/GOAL, JUST LIKE GPS CAN HELP SOMEONE TO REACH THE TERMINUS. THE COACH CAN SEE WHERE THE COACHEE IS AND WHERE HE/SHE WANTS TO BE.

A coachee can set the destination where he/she wants to reach, and a coach can help the coachee deep dive through all the routes of heart, mind and soul to reach the goal. It could be a personal goal, career goal or any area that needs improvement. As CPS always knows the current location, the coach always knows know where the coachee stands and how far or close he/she to the goal. Coach helps them to see their abilities, strength or stability and help them confront their challenges and the actuality of the situation.

As CPS provides direction, the coach guides the coachee through the step-by-step process or instruction to reach their goal. Coaches can provide encouragement and guidance to reach the goal. Just like CPS reroute or suggesting different routes seeing a bumpy or a difficult road similarly a coach can assist the person adjust the approach they see any obstacle to help them stay on track.

Like GPS never judges us on selecting a particular location, or taking a particular route or even using a GPS per se to reach the destination, a coach never judges the coachee and only provide support and constructive feedback to him/her. As GPS tracks down the distance covered or the distance to be covered similarly a coach also helps you track down the progress, encouraging you on every step and cheering you up on every achievement and making sure that you are heading on the right direction.

A coach helps you find the right pace for achieving your goal, whether you need to speed up or take things slower to avoid breakdown. coach does the same, giving you support and motivation without judgment.

Coaching is the process of enabling the Coachee to listen to a deeper reverberation of his or her mind to bring clarity and action plan. Coaching has no barrier of language, age or experience.

The concept of coaching is based on asking questions, facilitating the process of exploring the alternatives and way forward action plan. A coach may not necessarily be a subject matter expert, however, can be an effective coach by focusing on the "here" and "now".

Coaching: The Tour Guide

Coaching being the most natural form of conversation. My understanding of coaching has always been helping people find themselves and appreciate the way they are, also helping them discover the real uncut version of them. Coaching is a relationship between the coach and the individual—often referred to as the Coachee. Unlike Therapist, Counsellor, Mentor, Teacher and Trainer – they all would direct / suggest the way through their experience as this might limit the Coachee to explore themselves. Here in coaching, the Coach would only facilitate to help the individual identify their own strengths and navigate the obstacles.

As per my understanding on Coaching, I could relate the Tour Guide as a Coach for one's Journey. Just like how a tour guide leads a group through an unfamiliar city. The guide doesn't decide for the traveler, here the traveler is considered as Coachee as what they should experience or dictate where they must go. Instead, they provide the tools and insights necessary to make informed choices. The traveler remains in control of their experience but benefits from the guide's knowledge, context, and perspective.

The Role of the Tour Guide Coach

A skilled tour guide doesn't just point out landmarks; they tell the stories behind them, explain their significance, and help travelers appreciate the nuances they might otherwise overlook. Similarly, a coach doesn't just provide direction but helps individuals see their situations from new perspectives, shedding light on patterns, beliefs, and behaviors that may be holding them back.

Here are a few ways in which coaching parallels the role of a tour guide:

1. Navigating Complex Terrain:

Just as a tour guide knows the twists and turns of a city, a coach understands the complexities of personal and professional growth. They help coachees navigate challenges. Coaches ask thought-provoking questions that lead individuals to reflect on their values, goals, and decisions, making it easier to find clarity in moments of uncertainty.

2. Customizing the Experience:

Every traveler has a different interest—some might want to explore historical landmarks, while others are more intrigued by local cuisine. Similarly, a coach tailors their approach to the unique needs and aspirations of the coachee. There is no one-size-fits-all solution in coaching. Instead, the coach helps individuals define their own vision of success and creates a path that aligns with their personal and professional goals.

3. Encouraging Exploration:

Just as a good tour guide encourages travelers to explore, a coach motivates their coachee to step outside their comfort zone. Growth rarely happens in a place of comfort, and coaches understand that risk and challenge are essential components of development. Through supportive conversations, coaches create a safe space where individuals feel empowered to take risks, try new approaches, and embrace change without the fear of judgment.

4. Being Present Without Taking Control:

Perhaps one of the most essential aspects of both a tour guide and a coach is the balance between presence and independence. The tour guide doesn't take over the traveler's experience but is always there when needed, offering support and insight. Similarly, a coach doesn't dictate decisions but provides the encouragement and resources to help individuals make choices for themselves. The coachee remains in the driver's seat of their journey, with the coach serving as a companion along the way.

The Coachee's Role: The Traveler in Charge

In this metaphor, while the coach plays the role of the tour guide, it's important to recognize that the coachee remains the traveler—the one who is ultimately in charge of the journey. The coach may provide the map, suggest interesting detours, or recommend strategies to overcome roadblocks, but the responsibility for making decisions lies with the coachee.

This sense of ownership is critical to the coaching process. Personal growth and development require active participation and a willingness to take responsibility for one's progress. Much like a traveler must decide what to explore and where to spend their time, a coachee must choose how to engage with the coaching process and apply what they've learned.

Why Coaching Matters

In today's fast-paced world, we often find ourselves juggling multiple responsibilities, facing pressure to perform, and struggling to find balance. This constant demand can make it difficult to pause, reflect, and recalibrate.

A coach creates a space for deep, meaningful conversations that focus on the coachee's needs, goals, and aspirations. Whether it's with hurdles faced in Professional Life or Personal Life, coaching helps individuals tap into their potential and move forward with intention and confidence.

Conclusion: The Guided Journey to Success

Coaching is not about providing all the answers or setting a predefined path. Like a tour guide, the coach offers guidance, context, and insight to help individuals explore new perspectives and possibilities. The journey remains personal, with the coachee taking the lead in deciding where to go and how to get there.

Much like a memorable travel experience, coaching is about discovery—of oneself, one's potential, and the exciting opportunities that lie ahead. With the right coach by your side, the unfamiliar paths of personal and professional growth become not only navigable but rich with possibility, ensuring that the journey itself is as rewarding as the destination.

Coach as the Musical Notes in a Client's Life

Life is like a dance to the rhythm and melody which is unique to each person. As coaches, we aren't the ones orchestrating the music for any client or even leading the dance; instead, we are like musical notes. The notes are essential elements that guide, uplift, and harmonize with our clients' journeys. The client is like the orchestrator of his own life's music. Each coaching session is like creating a symphony of growth, clarity, and purpose, where the client is both the composer, orchestrator and performer. Here's how, in my experience, coaching mirrors musical notes, with each aspect adding depth and resonance to a client's life.

I WILL DIVIDE THIS INTO 5 SECTIONS OF MUSICAL NOTES, DEPICTING 5 DIFFERENT STAGES IN A COACHING SESSION.

1. The Opening Note: Establishing Trust and Rhythm

The start of any coaching relationship is like the opening notes of a song. It sets the tone, establishes the rhythm, and builds trust—the foundation for everything that follows. I remember an early coaching session with a client who came in feeling lost, burdened by self-doubt and uncertainty. In our initial conversations, we worked on building rapport, finding our shared rhythm, and establishing that foundational trust.

I see this phase as a gentle, steady beat—notes that assure, "You're safe here." Like a calm melody, our exchanges were focused on exploring without judgment. By mirroring their tone and meeting the coachee at their pace, I was able to establish a rhythm that made the coachee feel understood and valued. This trust was the opening note, the crucial foundation that allowed the rest of our work together to flourish. Like the pulse of a song that draws you in, establishing trust sets the tone for an authentic, growth-centered coaching journey.

2. Harmonizing Through Reflection and Inquiry

Once we're in rhythm, the music begins to expand, and as a coach, I help the client find harmony within themselves. Harmonizing in coaching is the art of reflection—holding up a mirror and helping clients see their inner landscape, values, and beliefs with clarity. Here, I see myself as a chord, blending with their melody, adding depth and dimension through thought-provoking questions and reflective dialogue.

A specific moment comes to mind with a client who struggled with work-life balance. Through deep inquiry, we peeled back the layers, examining not just the "what" of their stress but the "why." By asking questions that explored their core values and inner desires, I was like a harmonic note, amplifying and supporting their personal melody. It's a delicate interplay of notes, a supportive resonance that reveals hidden insights. In coaching, this harmony encourages clients to confront and realign with what truly matters to them.

3. The Crescendo: Encouraging Growth and Resilience

Every musical journey has a crescendo—a powerful, often intense moment that tests the limits of what's possible. In coaching, this is where the real work happens. I help clients find the courage to grow beyond their comfort zones, to hit the high notes they might have thought were out of reach. Growth, much like a crescendo, can feel daunting and exhilarating all at once.

One client was hesitant to take on a leadership role, fearing that they lacked the confidence and capability. I served as the musical guide, encouraging them to see their strengths and to step forward. Each session, I helped them play slightly higher notes, gradually working up to that crescendo of self-belief. In coaching, the crescendo isn't always easy—it's the climax of tension and release. Yet, it's in these moments of challenge that clients often experience the most profound shifts. Like reaching the high note in a song, pushing through discomfort to expand resilience becomes an empowering part of their melody.

4. The Rest Note: Creating Space for Reflection and Silence

In music, the rest notes—moments of silence between sounds—are as important as the notes themselves. In coaching, silence is similarly profound; it allows clients to process, reflect, and find clarity. There have been many sessions where a well-timed pause was more powerful than any question I could ask. In those moments, I am a silent note, holding space and allowing their inner voice to emerge.

One example stands out: a client was wrestling with a tough decision about leaving a job that no longer aligned with their values. Instead of filling the space with guidance or advice, I held a quiet pause. In the silence, they found their own clarity, realizing that the job had served its purpose and that it was time for a change. This use of silence as a "rest note" gave them the space to own their decision fully. The pauses in coaching are like the rests in music—they bring emphasis, allow for breath, and ultimately give the client room to recognize their truth.

5. The Closing Chord: Celebrating and Sustaining the Journey

Every piece of music concludes with a closing chord, a final note that leaves an echo, a sense of completion. In coaching, the closing of a session or engagement isn't a hard stop; it's a moment of celebration and reflection, honoring the progress made and looking forward to what's next. I like to think of it as helping the client play their final note of the current piece, leaving them with tools and insights that will sustain them long after our work together.

I had a client who came into coaching feeling uncertain about their future direction. By the end, they had not only clarified their path but also felt a renewed sense of purpose. Our last session was a beautiful closing chord—an acknowledgment of their journey, their growth, and the self-confidence they had built. Like the final note in a song, it resonated, signaling not an end but the transition to the next chapter.

Just as each note contributes to a song's beauty, each session and interaction in coaching adds to the client's evolving melody. As coaches, we are not the stars of the performance but the subtle notes that support, encourage, and bring out the music in each client's life. By establishing rhythm, harmonizing with their values, building resilience, holding reflective pauses, and celebrating each milestone, we help clients compose a life that resonates with authenticity and purpose.

In this way, we are the musical notes that amplify their growth, the harmonies that support their journey, and the quiet rests that allow for self-discovery. And in the end, as they play their unique song, our presence is felt in the background, a reminder that the melody is theirs, yet enriched by the notes we contributed along the way.

The Co-Pilot: Coaching Metaphor

The corporate world can feel like a turbulent sky, with sudden storms and unexpected winds. I remember the day I felt completely lost, overwhelmed by the corporate politics around me. The frustration was building, making it harder to stay focused on my work and, more importantly, on my goals. That was when my senior colleague, Taher, stepped in as my co-pilot.

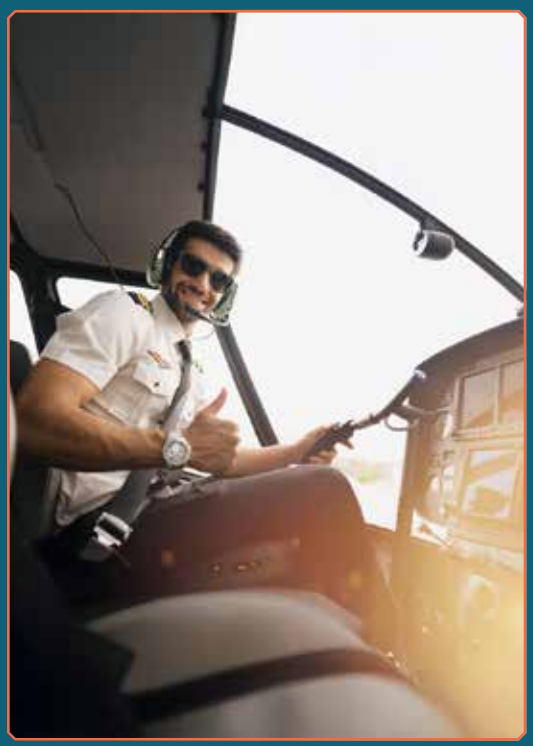

Taher had a calm presence, the kind that put others at ease. He never promised quick fixes, but he offered something even better: a perspective. One day, after noticing my frustration, he invited me for a cup of coffee. We found a quiet spot, and he listened as I shared my worries. I vented about the misunderstandings and the decisions that felt more about politics than progress.

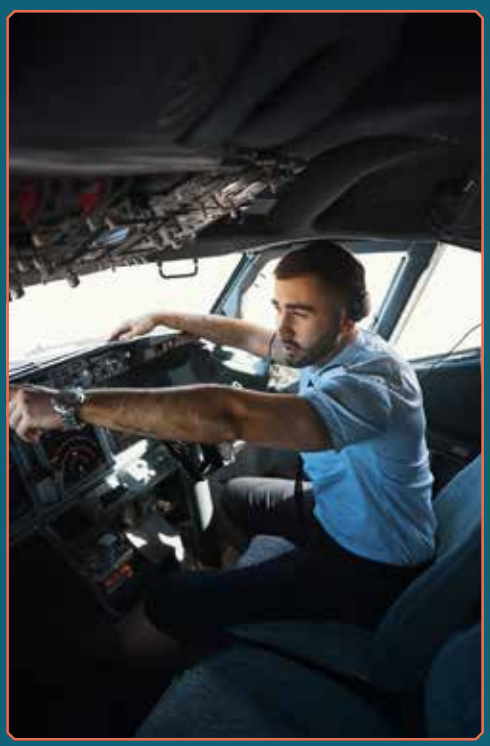

After a moment of silence, Taher spoke. "Navigating corporate life is a lot like flying a plane. There will be storms, and some of them you can't avoid. But with a good co-pilot, you're never alone in the cockpit." His metaphor resonated with me. Taher wasn't just my colleague; he was becoming my co-pilot, helping me navigate these complex dynamics.

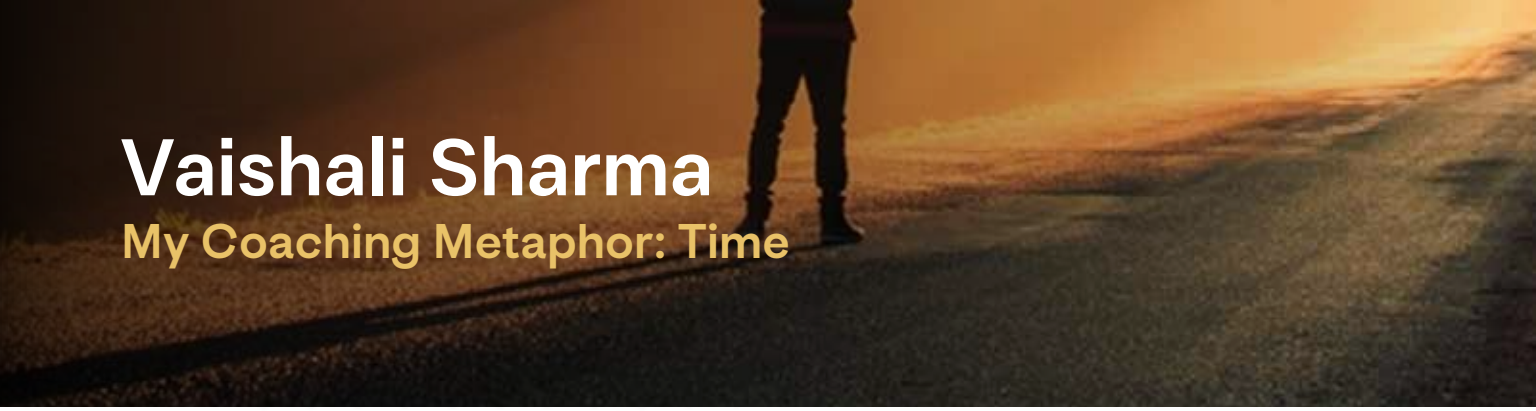

He didn't give me all the answers or tell me what to do. Instead, he asked questions, guiding me to see things differently. "What's the purpose behind your role?" he asked. "How can you align your goals with the bigger picture, regardless of the politics?" Taher helped me focus on what I could control—my work, my perspective, and my growth.

In the weeks that followed, I started seeing the challenges less as obstacles and more as opportunities to learn and build resilience. With Taher's support, I learned to keep my focus on what matters, adapting to the ups and downs but never losing sight of my destination. Taher's guidance made all the difference. Like a co-pilot, he didn't take over the controls; he shared the journey with me, offering support and wisdom without overshadowing my own path. I knew that, no matter the turbulence, I wasn't alone in the cockpit. And with a co-pilot like Taher, I learned to navigate with a steady hand, a clear mind, and a renewed sense of purpose.

My Coaching Metaphor: Time

Once Buddha was travelling with his followers. It had been a weary day and Buddha felt thirsty. He asked one of his disciples to fetch him some water from the lake that they had crossed over an hour ago. The disciple did as he was told and took with him his alms bowl to fill water for Buddha. However, when he reached the lake, he realized that the water was muddy due to carts that had just crossed through and decided that the water was unfit for drinking. He returned with an empty bowl and informed Buddha of the state of the water and requested him to wait until they reached the next river. Buddha however, insisted that the disciple go back to the lake and get water from the same. The disciple was unsure but once again, did as he was told and reached the lake after an hour of trudging. To his surprise the mud had settled and the water was now crystal clear, he filled his bowl and took the water for Buddha.

The lesson learnt was simple and yet powerful, sometimes just like the muddy water in the lake our mind gets cluttered with thoughts, doubts, uncertainties, judgements, thus blurring our vision and impacting our ability to move forward in the journey towards our goals. However, with time and the right guidance, the mud slowly settles giving us a clearer vision of the way forward.

THE COACHEE'S MIND HERE REPRESENTS THE MUDDY WATER THAT NEEDS TIME TO SETTLE, TO LET WHAT IS IMPORTANT SURFACE, LEAVING BEHIND DOUBTS AND EXCUSES. THE MORE WE TRY TO FORCE A SOLUTION, TO FIGURE OUT A WAY, THE MORE AGITATED THE MIND GETS.

The time represents a coach. A coach, just like time, provides a safe space for the thoughts to settle, and declutters the mind with the help of intrigue, curiosity, and intent thus leading to clarity of vision and a clear path forward. Time does not suggest/offer solutions, rather sits quietly with the coachee, while the coachee reflects, responds, searches, and finds his/her solutions. It is the process that enables the coachee and makes them self-reliant thus building a solution-oriented thought process that stays forever.

Just like time, a coach listens, builds trust, provides experiences, asks questions, wonders. He/she helps reveal to the coachee, not just what is said but how it is said, what are the emotions involved, what is the intent, what is important vs what is noise, keeps the conversation on track, pushes and challenges the coachee. Does all of this while letting the coachee be in charge of their own reflections, decisions, and actions.

In today's day and age with an explosion of information on social media, overflowing advises from people near and far, fast pace of living and leading life, it is very easy to understand the clutter that a mind is subjected to, resulting in the feeling of living an unfulfilled or an under fulfilled life at a personal or professional level. And in such a scenario, if one was to seek the support of a coach who builds a safe environment for the authentic self to shine, it could lead to the opening of mind and the untapping of immense potential hidden within. Its an attempt to not just tap the potential but to make it flow in a direction that leads to a sense of fulfillment.

As Veronica Roth puts it: Change, like healing, takes time.

Thank You!

Everything has seasons, and we have to be able to recognize when something's time has passed and be able to move into the next season. Everything that is alive requires pruning as well, which is a great metaphor for endings.
