JOURNEY THROUGH THE ENDLESS POSSIBILITIES OF METAPHOR

Coaching – from the Lens of A Photographer

Growing up, I was fascinated by photography and wanted to capture memories of places I visited, moments with family and milestones in life. The first camera that I laid my hands on was a basic point and shoot camera with a fixed aperture and fixed focal length lens. It used a film roll, that required chemicals and a lab to process the film. Given that it was a fixed focal length camera, it required tremendous luck and skill to get high quality pictures where the subject was clearly visible. It was a no brainer that I required a more sophisticated equipment to take better pictures.

Later in life, I acquired a DSLR camera that had all the features essential for amateur photography, and it allowed me to do postproduction processing on my computer. As I began playing with my new toy and began to learn the art of photography, I tried various techniques to accomplish taking great pictures only to learn that the biggest trick was that beauty lies in the eye of the beholder.

The secret to taking great pictures lay in the composition of the picture and how you framed it. If you failed to observe the basics like whether light is falling on the object or the camera, there is only so much postproduction can correct for. The sophistication of your camera or its lens didn't matter if the basic picture was poorly framed.

As I begin to understand the craft of Coaching, I see many similarities it shares with photography. Both are an acquired skill; the more you practice the better you can get at it.

While there can be many tools that you can use in Coaching and may look at issues from different lenses, it is what you help create, that is most unique. It is important to understand the subject of the picture i.e. context of the Coachee and bring the photographer's curiosity to the craft to help figure out the source of light for them to be able to illuminate their path in their own words.

Just as in digital photography, an element of noise is present in coaching sessions. It is important for the Coach to recognize and attempt to minimize it, while learning to acknowledge that not all noise is bad.

Nothing can be more gratifying for a Coach than to see their Coachee find a path to what they are trying to achieve. For that to happen, there are a few essentials. The Coach needs to understand their own biases, values, and triggers, so that as a Coach you are aware of the filters on your own lens. This is like knowing the limitations of your equipment and what you can and cannot do in post processing.

A good photographer never fails to look at the histogram to check for the quality of picture taken, similarly a Coach should never fail to agree with the Coachee on when to check-in on the progress being made by them.

In photography, an accomplished photographer knows the type of lens, aperture and exposure settings to use, when shooting different type of events from sports to weddings; but nothing matters more than the visualization of pictorial story that the photographer wants to tell. Similarly, a skilled Coach can deploy variety of tools to help the Coachee, but in a coaching environment nothing matters more than Coach's ability to demonstrate curiosity and ability to help the Coachee find the right solution.

Coaching and photography are both, science and art, and it is at the intersection, that magic happens!!

The Coaching Experience: Shaping Growth Like an Earthen Pot

Coaching is an experience, a transformative journey.

It is akin to the delicate art of shaping an earthen pot—a process that demands curiosity, keen observation, patience, skill, and deep understanding. This metaphor encapsulates the essence of coaching: creating a safe space, fostering growth, and gently guiding the coachee as they discover themselves and their unique form through heightened self-awareness.

The Clay: The Raw Potential

Every coaching journey begins with raw potential and the opportunity to help the coachee recognize their resources for change. Like unshaped clay, coachees possess innate qualities, experiences, and abilities. The coach's role is not to alter the clay but to guide its transformation, enhancing its natural form. This involves identifying strengths, understanding limitations, and embracing the uniqueness of each individual's journey. Through this process, coaches help coachee's build self-awareness and uncover their own answers.

The Potter's Wheel: The Coaching Process

The coaching process is akin to the potter's wheel—a dynamic and evolving journey where growth unfolds continuously. The wheel symbolizes the structured coaching framework: setting goals, engaging in self-reflection, creating action plans, and incorporating feedback.

As a coach, I ensure the wheels are spinning at the right pace—too slow, and progress stagnates; too fast, and the structure may falter.

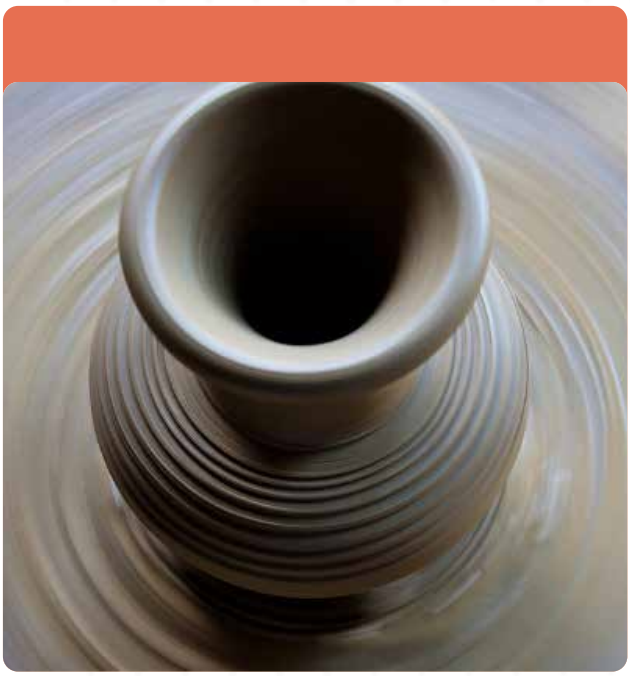

Shaping with Gentle Hands: The Coach's Role

Just as a potter shapes clay with care, a coach provides gentle but firm guidance. Excessive force can lead to resistance or self-doubt, while too little direction might result in stagnation. The key lies in creating a safe, nurturing environment where the coachee feels empowered to explore and grow.

By striking the right balance, the coach helps the coachee stretch beyond their comfort zone while feeling secure, enabling sustainable and meaningful transformation.

Water: Trust and the Emotional Connection

In pottery, water keeps the clay pliable and responsive. Similarly, trust, empathy, and emotional connection are the lifeblood of the coaching relationship. Coachees need to feel heard, valued, and understood to remain open to growth.

Building this emotional connection and trust is one of the most fulfilling aspects of coaching. When trust flows freely, coachee's become more receptive to feedback, willing to take risks, and deeply engaged in their development. Just as water prevents clay from drying out and cracking, empathy and encouragement keep the coaching relationship strong and effective.

Active listening and compassionate curiosity are pivotal — it allows the coach to tune into the coachee's emotions, state of mind, and body language, creating a supportive and dynamic space for growth.

The Finished Pot: A Unique Masterpiece

As a coach, witnessing individuals emerge stronger and more resilient is deeply rewarding. Like a fired pot ready to serve its purpose, coachee's become equipped to carry the weight of their aspirations and goals.

No two earthen pots are alike, just as no two coaching journeys are identical. Each coachee discovers their own path, purpose, and identity, shaped by their aspirations and experiences. The beauty of coaching lies in helping individuals embrace their unique strengths and contributions.

Coaching, like pottery, is a profound act of patience, care, and respect for the individuality of the material.T he coach's role is simply to guide, support, and facilitate their growth; a delicate yet powerful process akin to the craft of pottery. As a coach, my greatest reward is witnessing that transformation, just as a potter delights in a beautifully crafted vessel.

If you are someone seeking personal growth, remember: you are the clay, and you have the power to shape your own masterpiece.

The Warmth of a Candle

I was looking out of the window and thought to myself that the dusk had come early today. The sky was overcast with dark clouds hovering around accompanied by occasional thunder and lightning. A storm was brewing up. Suddenly, a loud noise woke me up from my thoughts. It was a lightning strike somewhere around and a heavy rain came pouring. As I gained my thoughts, there was a darkness around me. The power has gone. I scrambled through to reach my phone and to switch on the torch. Several minutes had gone past but the power has not come back. I reached out to the kitchen and picked up a candle and lighted it. As I picked up a book and sat down to read under the light of the candle, a realization came in.

While in the darkness, there is no need to look for the Sun as a Savior, to wish for it to come and disperse the dark shadows and clouds of illusion. A candle would actually be better. The Sun is too high up, too far away and does not depend upon us. It has its own path and the clouds which affect us so much does not matter for the Sun. It shines above them.

WHILE IN THE DARKNESS, WE NEED A CANDLE LIGHT. A SMALL, HUMBLE SOURCE OF LIGHT. A CLOSE ONE, WHICH WILL SHED LIGHT ON OUR NEXT STEP. A LIGHT WHICH WILL NOT BLIND US BUT A FRIENDLY LIGHT.

A coach is that humble candle who brings the light, the warmth and the trust in a person's life. While the candle burns in itself, it illuminates and shows the path. A coach creates that psychologically safe environment for the person and sows the seed of trust in the coaching relationship thereby opening up possibilities for a co-creation.

"It is better to light a Candle than to curse the darkness".

Coaching - A Journey of Self-Discovery

I have always been intrigued, what coaching is all about. Throughout my life I have been interchangeably using coaching as a phrase for both mentoring and counseling. However, when I started my journey to learn coaching it became more clearer on what a good coach is and what coaching entails. I must confess that this fascinating voyage is a journey of unlearning rather than learning. There were many myths and facts which are getting demolished on the way, and yes for the good. Habits take time to change and hence the journey to be a coach has been one of my most exhilarating experiences of life.

So, who is a coach and what is coaching. Imagine you are standing in front of a mirror and can't see yourself due to the mist. Our mind acts similarly where our thoughts, emotions and ideas are clouded with uncertainty, confusion or doubts mostly further obscured by fleeting emotions or distractions. A coach acts as a facilitator to clear these doubts and confusions and help exploring self to clear the confusion and slowly the mist starts getting clear by itself and a clear image of what you want to see emerges.

Being a coach starts with the journey to discover our own self. The coach needs to increase awareness about himself or herself, become aware of what are their values, beliefs and become aware of what triggers them. Awareness opens door for multiple opportunities and options. Have we ever seen a child being curious about a subject, the child just wants to know more and is not getting judgmental on what is being told to him or her. The child absorbs what is said and does not add his or her story to what is being told. A coach requires this child like detached curiosity to be able to do justice to his or her trade.

For a coaching conversation to flourish, coach needs to create a trust with the coachee. I always thought trust is a time game, but ever imagined that you don't go well with a colleague/person even if you spend a lot of time with the person. The reason being trust is a vibration game and not a time game. Once the vibration matches, it helps to create a physiological safe place for a conversation between coach and the coachee. This conversation can be transformational for the coachee. Listening is another great skill which a coach should possess, but the listening has to be with right intent as if you are listening to natures or a god's voice. Listen to what the Coachee is not saying, and this will only happen if both of you vibrate at the same plane. Ever wondered how you come to know what the people whom you love desire, you guessed right this is because your vibration matches.

A coach with the right set of questions clears the mist on the mirror for the coachee, who then can see the image very clearly. It is like the saying that If you give a man/women a fish you feed them for a day; but if you teach a man/women to fish, you feed them for the lifetime. Coaching is something similar like teaching to fish, clearing the mist on mirror or showing the light at the end of the tunnel and helping to find solution through careful nudging towards the end of tunnel where the coachee ultimately sees light and the aha moment occurs.

May be Coaching has selected me to serve the people and help them find light at the end of tunnel and clear the mist in front of them so that they can see the future with clarity, objectivity and positivity. However, I have to be aware to remain humble, grounded and curious.

Coaching – A Mirror That Reflects

"Mirror, mirror on the wall, who's the fairest of them all?"

As a child, I was fascinated by that line. It made me believe that mirrors held some kind of truth; that they could tell you something about yourself that you might not see on your own.

Of course, growing up, I realized mirrors don't talk. They don't give opinions. They don't sugarcoat or exaggerate.

They just reflect.

And coaching? It's the same.

A good coach, like a good mirror, doesn't change anything. They don't add filters, adjust the lighting, or make things look better (or worse) than they really are. They simply hold up a clear reflection—so you can see yourself fully. Strengths, blind spots, untapped potential, and all. And let's be honest, sometimes we love what we see. Other times... we'd rather look away.

1. Being the Right Kind of Mirror

Not all mirrors are created equal.

Some are flattering (you know, the good bathroom mirror that makes you feel like a rockstar). Others? Brutally honest (hello, changing-room lighting). And then there are the misleading ones—the funhouse mirrors that warp reality.

Coaching works the same way.

- A good coach doesn't distort the reflection—No filters, no sugarcoating.
- They don't hand you solutions—They create space for you to find your own.
- They don't make it about them—It's your reflection, not theirs.

If I, as a coach, bring in my own biases, judgments or distractions, it's like handing my coachee a funhouse mirror. They walk away seeing something warped instead of the truth.

A good mirror is clean, clear, and steady. A good coach is too.

2. The Fogged-Up Mirror Effect (AKA Coaching Without Presence)

Ever tried looking into a mirror after a hot shower? You wipe it once, twice... but the fog keeps creeping back. Frustrating, right?

That's exactly what happens when a coach isn't fully present.

If my mind is elsewhere—mentally drafting an email, thinking about lunch, or debating whether I should've gone with coffee instead of tea—then I'm not actually reflecting anything useful. Instead, my coachee gets fog.

True coaching is about being completely present—no mental noise, no distractions, just an open, steady space where the coachee can truly see themselves.

3. The Reflection is Theirs, Not Mine (No Stealing Credit for a Good Hair Day)

A mirror never takes credit for making someone look good. It doesn't say, "Wow, I really made you look amazing today."

Same with coaching.

- ↘ Their insights? Theirs.
- ↘ Their breakthroughs? Theirs.
- ↘ Their growth? Absolutely theirs.

A coach doesn't create change—we simply reveal what was already there.

Because the real magic? It's not in the mirror.
It's in the person looking into it.

4. Keeping My Own Mirror Clean

Mirrors collect dust. Smudges appear. Over time, without regular cleaning, they stop being useful.

Same with coaching.

If I'm not checking in with myself, I risk projecting my own thoughts, assumptions, or blind spots onto my coachee.

Instead of holding up a neutral, clear reflection, I end up handing them my version of reality.

So, I need make it a habit to:

- ↘ Journal – Capturing coaching experiences to spot patterns and blind spots.
- ↘ Self-check – Asking, Am I reflecting, or subtly directing?
- ↘ Debrief with fellow coaches – Because even mirrors need a second opinion.

5. Coaching: The Mirror That Helps You See What Truly Matters

A mirror doesn't change you.

It doesn't add or remove anything.

It simply shows you what's already there.

And coaching? It's the same.

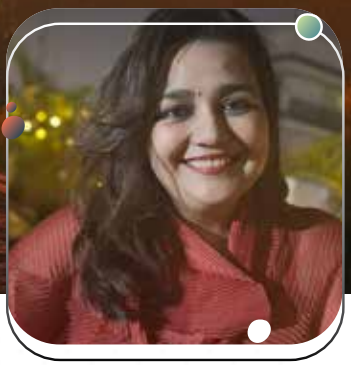

Sometimes, a coachee looks into the metaphorical mirror and sees clarity. Other times, they see discomfort.

But no matter what, I hold that mirror steady—because true reflection, even when it's uncomfortable, is the first step toward real transformation.

Because in the end, the magic isn't in the mirror. It's in the reflection.

The Lighthouse

Coaching, The Lighthouse

Coaching is like a lighthouse serving as a navigational tool into one's core and soul. To me it's an amalgamation of behaviours such as empathy, listening, compassion , wisdom and perseverance. It's seamlessly also connected with the modern need of suspending judgment.

Just like the lighthouse, Coaching helps in giving directions to various aspects of life that may not be visible to the naked eye, once identified though, can be life transforming and soulful. It rises above what we all see at the forefront but may find it hard to believe to be executed and as some say, "too good to be true in a real world"

The beauty about Lighthouse and Coaching is, relentlessly offering light, insight and perspective, by facilitating us to find our own path, to find our own light.

It warns us of difficulties and challenges, just like a "Wise Critic" but allows us to be the "Dreamer" of our own goals and aspirations. Keeping the "Realistic" side equally real.

The Lighthouses Keeper

And the Coach is the lighthouse Keeper, the guide, the observer, the motivator and a storyteller, sharing your stories. He is always rooting for those who are on their path and celebrates you for all achievements, big or small.

And makes us believe that all of this is existential and that the Dream is actually Real!

It's just about accomplishing it!

The Tower:

There's no wreck, just structuring and restructuring, building, rebuilding

And just as it's mentioned in the "The Silva Mind Control Method", "Everyday, in every way, we get better and better and better".

Tumultuous times are ubiquitous and inevitable. But once you know the power of Coaching, for the role it plays as a Lighthouse, it will always support your directions wade you through life's journey;

Good or Bad
Easy or Difficult
Topsy Turvy
Smooth or Turbulent

That's not all:

The Beacon is actually your mind. The Radio Transmitter is your energy, your vibration, which through Coaching, you can navigate and create.

THE PROCESS WILL JUST FACILITATE YOU TO SEE YOUR LIGHT WITHIN.

A Mountain Climb

The Summit Within: My Journey to Becoming a Coach

Standing at the base of Mount Coaching, I feel both excitement and trepidation. The path to becoming a trained coach tower before me like a majestic peak disappearing into the clouds. As I begin this transformative journey, I'm reminded of the parallels between mountaineering and my pursuit of becoming a coach—both require careful preparation, unwavering commitment, and the courage to step into unknown territory.

My Base Camp: Starting from Where I Am

Here at base camp, I'm taking stock of what I bring to this journey. My backpack contains years of life experience, a deep desire to acquire new skills, and natural listening abilities. Yet I know there's so much more equipment I need to gather—coaching certifications, structured methodologies, and practical experience. Like a climber checking their gear, I'm assessing which tools I need to acquire before attempting the ascent.

Finding My Own Sherpas: Learning from Master Coaches

One of my first revelations was that I don't have to make this climb alone. Just as mountaineers rely on experienced Sherpas, I've begun seeking out mentor coaches who have already blazed these trails. Their footprints in the snow show me possible paths, and their stories of past climbs help me understand what lies ahead. Every coaching session I observe, every class I attend, adds another crucial piece to my climbing gear.

The Initial Ascent: My First Coaching Steps

My early attempts at coaching feel like those first tentative steps up the mountain. Sometimes I stumble, catching myself as I lean too heavily on giving advice rather than asking powerful questions. Other times, I find solid footing, discovering moments of genuine connection with practice coaches and coachees. Each step, whether sturdy or shaky, teaches me something valuable about the terrain of human interaction.

Weather Patterns: Navigating Doubts and Challenges

Some days, the visibility is poor. Imposter syndrome clouds my path—who am I to aspire to guide others on their journeys? But just as mountaineers learn to read weather patterns, I'm learning to recognize these thoughts as temporary conditions rather than insurmountable obstacles. Each successful practice session parts the clouds a little more, revealing the path ahead.

False Summits: The Continuous Learning Journey

Initially, I thought obtaining my first coaching certification would be reaching the summit. Now I understand that it's merely a base camp for higher climbs. Each new skill I master reveals new heights of expertise to reach. The ICF credentials I once saw as the peak now appear as vital waypoints on a much longer journey.

Finding My Climbing Style: Developing My Coaching Voice

Just as every climber develops their unique technique, I'm discovering my authentic coaching style. Sometimes I mirror the approaches of coaches I admire, but increasingly, I'm finding my own rhythm and pace. My background in Human Resources gives me a wide perspective, becoming my specialized climbing gear for particular coaching challenges.

Acclimatizing: Building Confidence Through Practice

With each practice session, I'm acclimatizing to higher altitudes of coaching complexity. Starting with friends and colleagues willing to humour me, I'm gradually taking on more challenging scenarios. Like a climber's lungs adapting to thinner air, my coaching muscles are getting stronger with every session.

The View So Far: Early Insights and Growth

Though I'm still in the early stages of my ascent, the view already looks different from here. I see human potential and challenges differently now. My conversations, both in and out of coaching sessions, have more depth and purpose. The tools I'm gathering aren't just for my coachees—they're transforming my own life as well.

Looking Ahead: The Continuing Journey

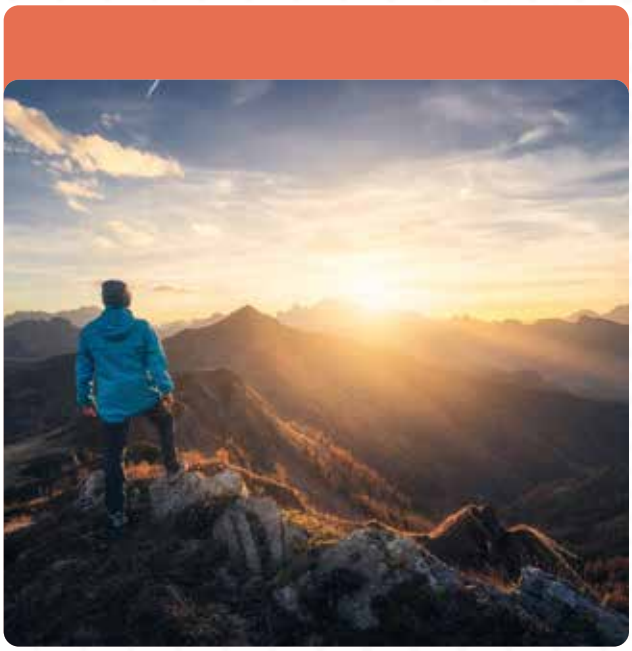

From my current vantage point, I can see many peaks ahead in my coaching journey. There's the summit of establishing my own brand as a coach, the peak of developing specialized niches, and the soaring heights of mastery that my mentors model. Each one calls to me, not as an endpoint, but as an exciting next stage in this lifelong expedition.

A Letter to Fellow Aspiring Coaches

To others standing at their own base camps: this journey is both more challenging and more rewarding than it might first appear. The path to becoming a coach demands everything a mountain climb requires—preparation, perseverance, and courage. But it also offers something unique: the privilege of helping others find their way up their own mountains.

As I continue my ascent, I carry this truth with me: every step I take in my development as a coach not only brings me closer to my summit but better equips me to support others in reaching theirs. The mountain may be high, but the view—and the impact we can have—makes every step worthwhile.

WHAT MOUNTAIN ARE YOU PREPARING TO CLIMB?

My Metaphor of Coaching: "Nimitta Matram Bhava Savyasachin"

IN Aug of 2022, I decided to undertake a journey, the idea, the adventure had grown in me in my anticipation. I had 11-12 days to go on a solo road-trip in a cherry red, Chevrolet spark ~13 years old. I was apprehensive, it was monsoon in North India, I took a leap of faith, cranked the ignition and headed out. While on the trip, I was driving for over 10-12 hours per day, with an excitement to see the western ghats, I had heard it was beautiful during rains and indeed it was. During the entire ordeal I was in my red car, looking around the scenic nature, on the highway, listening to podcasts, audiobooks, driving fasted from dawn till dusk. The experience stayed with me. It altered my perception of reality, pushed my boundaries and shifted my experience of life.

While in coaching conversations, my mind still goes to the drive. I feel the visual imagery moving in the background, the clouds spread out to the horizons, with the open road in front of me. I experience emotions from the stories shared by my co-passenger like the rain through my journey. During these conversations, I am in an immersive state holding space for my co-traveler to express themselves, intently listening to them with a child-like wonder to understand their world view. The cherry red car from my trip is the space I create wherein my co-passenger has the permission to be their most vulnerable self. It's like a dance with my floating in an out of my consciousness to reflect my travelers' thoughts from a neutral perspective without coloring it with my past experiences.

I practice the expansion of my consciousness to include two people at once and leverage this space to co-create change for my fellow traveler to head in a direction where they want to go. I curiously explore the world they are creating for self by reflecting them to themselves. Every conversation undertaken is a journey of 1000 miles, where, I am not sure at the beginning, where we are headed, what path we will take, but there is a guarantee of adventure, wonder and self-discovery! Ongoing dialogue helps understand my fellow passengers' motivations, why they are doing what they are doing. Probing to understand the deeper significance of their goals for them, course correcting / moving through the obstacles for them to achieve their goals. Power of inquiry, to enable them to access resources within themselves which were dormant. My visualization of this journey is self as an instrument ("Nimitta Matram Bhava Savyasachin") for my co-traveler, to co-create a space wherein they can get to their destination.

As a closing note, I did manage to cover the western ghats starting Delhi to Kanyakumari and came back to Delhi in 10-11 days. Overall trip was 6500kms, one of my most treasured memories. Our world is made up of experiences, this specific experience leveraged inner resources within me, some of which I didn't know existed till I tapped into them. This experience is a gift I share in all my conversations metaphorically. Being in a state of motion, experiencing conversations while holding space for my co-traveler and enabling them tap into their inner resources as they overcome hurdles to achieve their chosen outcomes.

A Gardener

Coaching is Like Gardening: Cultivating Growth and Potential

Coaching is like gardening, it's something that requires patience, care, and dedication. Both involve nurturing growth, removing obstacles, and creating an environment where development/growth can happen. A gardener does not force plants to grow; rather, they cultivate the right conditions—providing sunlight, water, right soil and nourishment—to allow nature to take its course. Similarly, a coach does not impose change but facilitates it by creating the right conditions and eco system for individuals to flourish.

Planting the seed:

Every great garden starts with seeds, just as every coaching journey begins with potential. Seeds contain the blueprint of what they are meant to become, but without the right conditions, they will not reach their full potential. A coach, like a gardener, recognizes the possibilities within each individual and provides the necessary support/guidance to help them take root.

Planting a seed is only the first step. In coaching, this equates to identifying goals, aspirations, and challenges. An effective coach helps individuals gain clarity about their ambitions and lays the groundwork for their growth by offering guidance, feedback and encouragement.

Create the right environment:

Just as plants require specific conditions to grow—some thrive in sunlight while others prefer shade—people also need the right environment to develop. A coach creates a psychologically safe and supportive space where individuals feel encouraged to explore their potential and feel safe being open and vulnerable. This environment is built on trust, open communication, and a willingness to embrace challenges, accept realities and move ahead.

Coaches tailor their approach based on the individual's unique needs, just as a gardener adjusts watering schedules, soil conditions, and sunlight exposure based on the type of plant. Some individuals may require more structure and accountability, while others may flourish with freedom and self-direction. Understanding these needs allows a coach to create an optimal environment for growth.

Growth with encouragement and feedback:

In gardening, plants need water, nutrients, and sunlight to grow. In coaching, the equivalent is encouragement, knowledge, time to reflect and constructive feedback. Just as too much water can drown a plant or too little sunlight can stunt its growth, an imbalance between feedback, guidance and encouragement can impact/hinder personal development.

A coach carefully assesses when to provide support and when to step back and lets individuals find their own way. Encouragement fuels confidence, while constructive feedback helps individuals refine their path to their goals and overcome obstacles. The best coaches, like master gardeners, know that consistent care—not micromanagement—is the key to sustainable growth.

Overcoming challenges and obstacles:

Every garden faces challenges—pests, weeds, and unpredictable weather. Similarly, personal and professional growth comes with setbacks, self-doubt, and external obstacles. A gardener prunes unhealthy branches to promote better growth, just as a coach helps individuals eliminate self-limiting beliefs and ineffective habits.

Coaching involves recognizing barriers that hinder progress and helping individuals navigate through them. This could mean addressing fears, restructuring thought patterns, or developing new strategies to overcome difficulties. Through careful pruning, both in the garden and in personal development, growth becomes stronger and more sustainable.

Patience and the Power of Time:

A garden does not bloom overnight, and neither does personal transformation. Growth takes time, patience, and consistency. A coach understands that meaningful change does not happen instantly but is a process of gradual progress. Just as a gardener must trust the process of nature, a coach must trust the journey of personal development.

Impatience can lead to frustration, but both coaching and gardening teach the importance of slow and steady progress. Small, but consistent efforts lead to significant change over time. By celebrating small milestones and recognizing progress, both the gardener and the coach reinforce the motivation to continue growing.

Adapting to Change and Challenges:

Gardening requires adaptability. A sudden drought, unexpected frost, or invasive pests can force a gardener to adjust their methods. Likewise, in coaching, life's unpredictability demands flexibility. Goals may shift, unexpected challenges may arise, and individuals may need to pivot their strategies and be agile.

A skilled coach, like a seasoned gardener, embraces these changes and helps individuals navigate them with resilience. This adaptability ensures that growth continues, even when conditions are less than ideal. Growth may slow down, however, you still progress.

The Reward of Flourishing Growth:

The most gratifying moment for a gardener is seeing their plants bloom and thrive. Likewise, a coach finds fulfillment in witnessing an individual's progress, confidence, and success. The true joy of coaching comes not from taking credit for someone's growth but from knowing they played a role in helping someone reach their full potential.

Gardening and coaching share a fundamental truth: growth is an ongoing journey. A well-tended garden continues to flourish year after year, just as a well-coached individual continues to evolve long after the coaching relationship ends.

Conclusion:

Coaching is an act of faith, patience, and dedication. It requires a nurturing touch, an understanding of unique needs, and a commitment to creating the right conditions for growth. By planting seeds of potential, providing the right environment, nourishing development, and embracing challenges, both gardeners and coaches play a crucial role in fostering transformation.

The beauty of both coaching and gardening lies in the belief that with the right care, guidance, and persistence, anything can flourish. Whether growing plants or cultivating human potential, the reward is in the journey of growth itself.

Motherhood: My Metaphor for Coaching

The day I held my daughter, Maanya, for the first time, something within me shifted. I thought I was stepping into motherhood simply to nurture her, but what I didn't realize was my journey as a coach started that day, though I didn't know it at the time. Motherhood, for me, is my metaphor for coaching—it's about growth, guidance, patience, and the magic of discovering yourself while helping someone else discover their path. It's that feeling of participating in something bigger than yourself, of helping shape someone's future while learning and growing alongside them.

Khalil Gibran's words from On Children resonate deeply with me:

"Your children are not your children. They are the sons and daughters of Life's longing for itself. They come through you but not from you, and though they are with you, yet they belong not to you."

This reflects the heart of both motherhood and coaching. Just as a mother supports her child's growth without controlling their future, a coach guides someone without imposing their vision.

A Journey of Mutual Growth

Motherhood isn't just about raising a child-it's also about discovering who you are. When I look at my own journey of motherhood, I realize how much I've learned and grown. I've learned to be patient, to see things from a different perspective, & to become more attuned to my child's needs. In a sense, my child is helping me just as much as I am helping her. And isn't that what coaching is about? It's not just about guiding someone; it's about creating a space for them to discover their own path while you're both growing together. This mutual growth is what makes both motherhood & coaching transformative. It's a process of co-creation, where both the mother and the child-or the coach & the coachee-learn, adapt, & grow together.

The Power of Awareness

Motherhood heightened my awareness in ways I never thought possible. I began noticing the small things—how Maanya's body language changed when she was upset, how she explored the world with wide eyes, and even the meaning behind her silence. I had to be present, to listen beyond words.

In coaching process, building self awareness about yourself and to help your coachee to develop the same is invaluable because awareness creates choices. Coach helps coachee understand their thoughts, feelings, and actions so they can make empowered decisions. Like guiding a child, coaching is not about giving solutions but helping someone find their own.

Curiosity and Adaptability

One of the most beautiful aspects of motherhood is the endless curiosity it brings. I often find myself wondering who Maanya will grow up to be, what passions she will develop, and how she will navigate life. Each day brings new surprises and lessons, and I've learned to embrace that sense of curiosity as a mother.

In coaching, curiosity is just as essential. A coach doesn't need all the answers—what matters is staying curious about the coachee's journey. Every session is an opportunity to learn something new, to ask questions, and to discover insights together.

Patience and Long-Term Growth

Both motherhood and coaching require patience. Growth doesn't happen overnight. I've learned this as a mother, waiting for Maanya to take her first steps or learn her first words. In coaching, breakthroughs also take time. Sometimes progress is slow, but when it happens, it's deeply rewarding.

Co-Creation: Building a Future Together

At the heart of both motherhood and coaching is co-creation. As I help Maanya grow into her potential, I am growing too. The same is true in coaching—guiding someone to success often leads to personal transformation for the coach. Both roles are about creating a space where growth flourishes naturally.

Motherhood has made me a better coach, and coaching has made me a better mother. Both roles are journeys of discovery, patience, and shared growth. They remind me that life is not about control but about creating space for possibilities to unfold.

SHUKRAN FOR BEING PART OF MY JOURNEY!

Coaching as Music

Coaching as Music: The Power of Pauses

Have you ever noticed that the most powerful moments in music aren't just the notes—it's the silence between them? Those pauses? That's where the magic happens. And coaching? It's the same. It's not just about what's said; it's about what's not said. It's about holding space, about allowing reflection, about letting the music of insight emerge naturally.

Pauses Create the Space for the Next Note

Think about a musician. They don't just rush through a song, cramming in every note they can. They let the melody breathe. They allow space for the next note to find its place. Coaching works the same way. Awareness creates choices, and pauses create the space for those choices to surface. If we, as coaches, jump in too soon, we drown out the client's own music. But when we hold that pause, when we let the silence do the work—that's when clarity and creativity show up.

The Power of a Single Note: Staying Curious

Ever heard a song where a single note lingers just a little longer than expected? That note alone can change the entire mood of a piece. In coaching, staying curious for just a little longer before feeling the urge to advice or moving on is exactly like that. It's about resisting the temptation to fill the space and instead, adding one more moment of exploration, one more question, one more beat of silence. Because sometimes, the most powerful insights emerge in the space where we almost speak—but don't.

Coaching as a Co-Creation of Music

A coaching conversation isn't a solo—it's a duet. The coach doesn't compose the song for the client; they co-create it, allowing the rhythm to emerge organically. The client listens to their own music, finds their own beat, and the coach? They hold the space, trusting that the melody will come together in its own way. Great coaches don't impose—they guide, they trust, they let the music unfold.

Deep Listening: Tuning Into the Client's Music

Dr. Marilyn Atkinson says in her book, "Everything in coaching hinges on listening because what we are listening for affects where we are speaking from and unfolds how we are being with and for each other." Think about that. Listening isn't passive—it's an act of tuning in. Just like a musician tunes their instrument before they play, a coach must tune into their client's emotions, energy, and unspoken thoughts. If we listen only for problems to fix, we miss the richness of the full composition. But if we listen for potential, for possibilities—that's when we start to hear the real music.

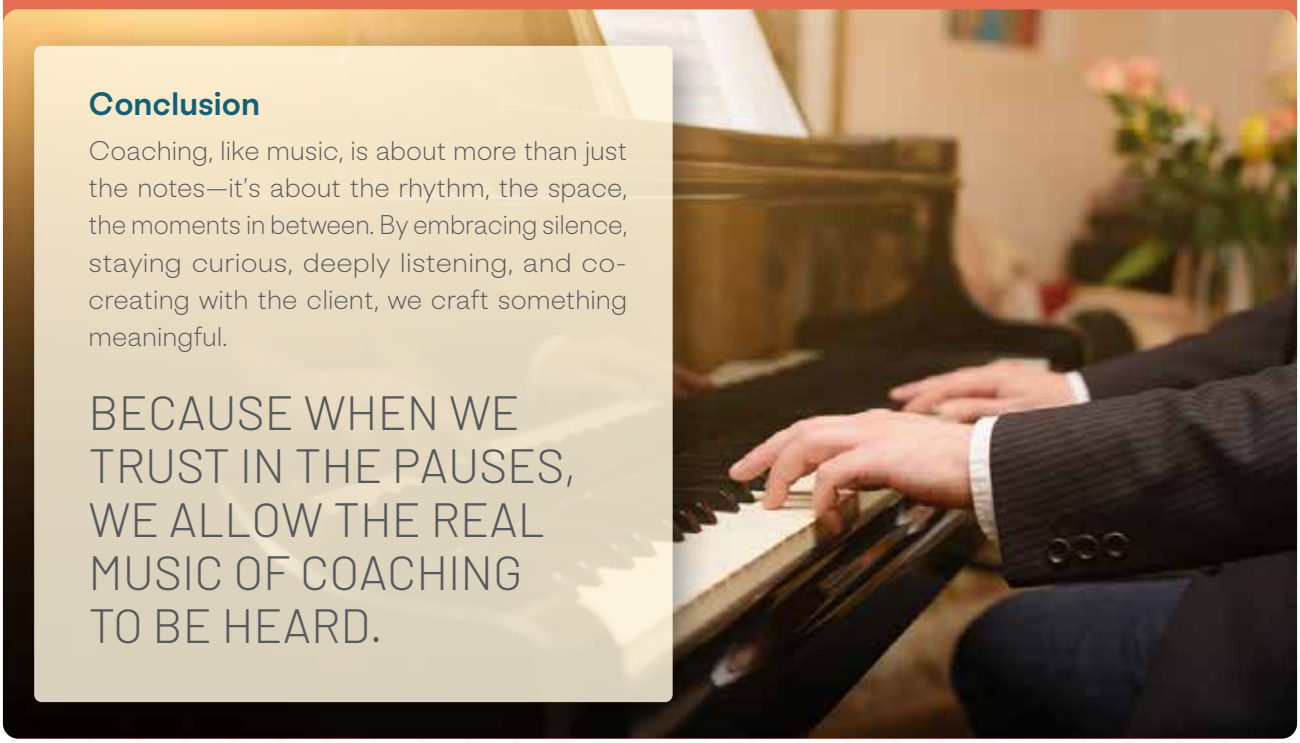

The Art of Presence: Letting the Music Breathe

A great musician doesn't rush. They stay present. They let the music unfold naturally. And a great coach? They do the same. They hold stillness. They let thoughts and emotions take shape. They resist the urge to control the conversation, instead allowing the dialogue to develop in its own rhythm. When we trust the pauses, we invite something deeper—trust, insight, and transformation.

Conclusion

Coaching, like music, is about more than just the notes—it's about the rhythm, the space, the moments in between. By embracing silence, staying curious, deeply listening, and co-creating with the client, we craft something meaningful.

BECAUSE WHEN WE TRUST IN THE PAUSES, WE ALLOW THE REAL MUSIC OF COACHING TO BE HEARD.

A 'White Canvas' for your Mona Lisa....

Recently some great blessings came my way and this amazing 'Coaching Journey' chose me. In Jan'2025, I enrolled myself for 'Executive Coaching Certification Program' exactly one week before the classes started and after giving it a full day's time to ponder over my commitment to be an effective 'Executive Coach' soon.

Upon enrolling, I learnt it's a 'transformative' journey where you 'Learn to Unlearn', it's a journey of 'Listening over Advising', it's a journey of 'Asking the Right Questions' over 'Providing the Right Answers'.

My father remained my best 'Coach', my best 'Cheer Leader' and my best 'Accountability Partner'. Once told him about 'Global Professional HR Certification (CPHR)' and mentioned "most people make multiple attempts at it while pursuing it along with their jobs but my friend has done it after preparing for 3 months, so I am thinking, may be I will be able to do it too". His question on this was – 'Whats the plan?' And I responded, 'thinking of starting to prepare at my own pace and when I will feel ready, I will enroll for the exam'. From this conversation, to being scheduled for the exam in exactly 3 month's time and clearing it with high scores, were the outcomes he could help achieve. In one random conversation while watching TV, I mentioned, 'given her background, if Mayawati Ji can become the Chief Minister, I think if I try, I can also become the Prime Minister' . And he responded – 'Sure, What's the plan?'

This conversation became extremely significant for me in life and helped me understand:

- My Coach truly believed in all my 'Audacious' Goals
- The key is to have a plan in place for every 'Goal'
- As a Coach, always come from the space of 'Love', 'Faith' and 'Belief' in your Coachee's abilities to make any 'Audacious Goal' happen

The above mentioned 3 key learnings are easier to understand but complex to practice. I learned 'Coaching' is a journey to:

- Unlearn to 'Judge'
- Unlearn to offer solutions or be a 'problem-solver'
- Unlearn to 'doubt' the capabilities of your 'Coachee' to achieve any 'Audacious' Goal

To depict my role as your 'Coach', I have chosen a metaphor of being 'The White Canvas'.

When you decide to paint your 'Mona Lisa', as a Coach, I am going to be 'The White Canvas' which would offer you all the possibilities of creating your 'Magnum Opus'.

- A painter's canvas always hopes, believes and prays for the end result to be the best piece of art ever. (A Coach should always believe in your success)
- The artist can invest hours, days, weeks or months in creating the painting – 'The White Canvas' would continue to hold the base strong during the entire journey. (A Coach should be able to hold the 'space' in your entire journey)
- The artist's vision / context would lead to choosing the colours, tools, coats etc. and 'The White Canvas' will keep showing him how his vision would translate into an actual piece of art. (A Coach should keep supporting in your vision vs. reality)

And in the end, when you do end up creating your Mona Lisa, 'The White Canvas' you started with, would become 'Immortal' as well.

Coaching Through the Looking Glass: The Tri-Fold Mirror Metaphor

Picture yourself in an intimate fitting room at a clothing store. Before you stands a three-way mirror with folding side panels. As you move, the mirror captures your image from various angles, offering a more complete picture of yourself than you usually see in your day-to-day life. This trifold mirror is an apt metaphor for coaching, and this article will explain why.

Firstly, a tri-fold mirror offers more than a single reflection; its comprehensive view often reveals things you may not have noticed before—perhaps the way you carry yourself, a habit in your posture, or an aspect of your appearance you typically miss in your everyday rushed glances in the bathroom mirror. Coaching functions the same way as a tri-fold mirror, helping people see themselves and their situations from a broader point of view.

Most of us go through life with a "single mirror" view of ourselves. We see ourselves and our situations from a narrow perspective stemming from our beliefs, biases and insecurities. This narrow perspective often limits our potential and growth without realising it. Like a tri-fold mirror, coaching expands our view of ourselves and our situations. Through thought-provoking questions and active listening, coaches help us observe our situations, behaviours, and patterns from new perspectives. For example, a first-time manager may be unaware of how their communication style impacts employee relationships. A coach could then inquire, "How do you think your employees might perceive your communication style?" The question encourages self-reflection from an external perspective they may not have considered before.

A coach does more than hold up a metaphorical tri-fold mirror—they guide you to position yourself for clear, honest self-reflection. Like a tri-fold mirror, coaching is powerful because it brings together multiple perspectives—your goals, strengths, weaknesses, values, motivations, and other aspects. A skilled coach guides you in shifting between these views, revealing connections and insights that a single perspective might miss. They might help you see how a past success holds the key to overcoming a current challenge or how your present strengths can lead to exciting future opportunities. Just as you can adjust a tri-fold mirror's panels, a coach helps refine your perspective.

At times, you might need to broaden your view to see the bigger picture and its possibilities. In other cases, you may need to narrow your focus to specific aspects. The coach will support you in maintaining a balanced perspective and ensure you do not become overly focused on one limiting perspective.

However, coaching goes beyond mere reflection. Coaches help you see different perspectives and integrate them into actionable insights and concrete steps forward. They support you moving from awareness to action, from insight to implementation. Sometimes, the panels get cloudy with limiting beliefs or negative self-talk. Coaches help us "clean the mirror" by challenging these beliefs and reframing them constructively. Through tools, frameworks and approaches, coaches help us understand what we see and translate it into meaningful change.

Ultimately, the tri-fold mirror serves as a powerful metaphor for the transformative nature of coaching. Like the mirror, coaching offers multiple perspectives, encouraging reflection and tangible adjustments. By uncovering blind spots and fostering self-discovery, coaching empowers individuals to achieve meaningful growth.

Filling Up the Glass to Empty It Again

Filling Up the Glass to Empty It Again: The Role of a Coach for a Coachee

Coaching is an intimate and transformative relationship, one that hinges on deep listening, empathy, and the careful balance between involvement and detachment. A powerful metaphor which resonated strongly with me to understand the dynamic between a coach and a coachee is that of a glass. The coach is like the glass that holds liquid, and the liquid represents the emotions, thoughts, and challenges of the coachee. The act of filling up the glass and emptying it again mirrors the coaching process—an art of both holding and releasing, of being present without becoming overwhelmed, and of helping the coachee clear the way for new insights and growth.

Filling the Glass: Holding Space for the Coachee

In the initial stages of the coaching process, the coach's primary role is to fill the glass. This means holding the coachee's emotions, experiences, and thoughts without judgment. The coach listens deeply, fully engaged yet detached enough to maintain a neutral stance. They hold space for the coachee to express themselves freely, without the pressure of solutions or immediate interventions. The glass, as an object, is receptive, providing a container that allows the liquid (the coachee's feelings and thoughts) to take shape, to fill the space in ways that may not be immediately understood or processed.

During this time, the coach does not rush to fill the coachee's silence or discomfort. Instead, they create an environment of openness and curiosity. The coach listens with detached curiosity, meaning they do not allow their own biases, experiences, or opinions to cloud their understanding of the coachee's narrative. They remain present, aware of the emotions in the room but never consumed by them.

Holding the liquid in the glass is a metaphor for offering a safe space where the coachee can explore and articulate what has been brewing inside them. The coach's role is not to push the coachee toward answers but to allow the coachee's thoughts and emotions to surface in their own time and form. This process is cathartic for the coachee, as it provides them with a moment to unburden themselves, express their vulnerabilities, and face the complexities within.

The Importance of Detachment: Emptying the Glass

As the coaching relationship progresses, one of the most powerful aspects of the coach's role is the ability to "empty the glass." Once the coachee has shared their thoughts and emotions, and the liquid within the glass has been fully expressed, the coach must allow the glass to be emptied. This is not to say the coach abandons the coachee or the work they've done together. Rather, the act of emptying the glass symbolizes the coach's capacity to release the coachee's challenges and not become overly attached to them.

The coach's detachment from the coachee's struggles is critical for several reasons. First, it prevents the coach from becoming emotionally entangled with the coachee's problems, which could cloud their ability to guide effectively. By emptying the glass, the coach clears space for the next conversation, free of any lingering emotions or judgments from the previous session. This allows the coach to approach each new discussion with fresh eyes, offering clarity and objectivity.

The coach's detachment is not coldness or disinterest. It is a conscious act of emotional discipline. The coach remains committed to the coachee's growth and well-being, but they do not allow themselves to be overwhelmed by the coachee's emotions or problems. They understand that the coachee is responsible for their own journey and that the coach's role is to facilitate the coachee's discovery, not to carry their burdens.

A Fresh Glass: Moving On with New Possibilities

After emptying the glass, the coach enters each new session with a sense of renewal. Like a glass that is emptied and is now ready to be filled again, the coach must approach each session with an open mind, free from previous biases or assumptions. This allows the coach to engage with the coachee's evolving journey, bringing fresh perspectives and insight to each new conversation.

By emptying the glass, the coach also models for the coachee how to let go of past emotions and challenges. The coachee may begin to internalize the importance of release in their own life, understanding that it is crucial to process their emotions and then create space for new possibilities. Just as the coach empties the glass to prepare for the next conversation, the coachee can learn to release what no longer serves them, clearing the way for new insights and actions. This cycle of filling and emptying is central to the coaching dynamic. It allows the coachee to feel heard and understood in one moment, while also creating the freedom to move forward in the next. It offers the coachee a way to step back from their emotional baggage and embrace new opportunities for growth.

In Essence

The metaphor of filling up the glass to empty it again encapsulates the core of the coaching process. The coach holds space for the coachee, listening with detached curiosity and offering a non-judgmental environment for exploration. When the time is right, the coach empties the glass, releasing the coachee's struggles and allowing each conversation to begin anew, with fresh possibilities. This dynamic creates a coaching environment that is both supportive and empowering, guiding the coachee toward self-discovery, growth, and transformation. Through the act of filling and emptying, the coach plays a pivotal role in helping the coachee navigate their journey, one conversation at a time.

Crafting a Diamond from a Stone

When I first stepped into coaching, I saw myself as a jeweler—someone who could take rough stones and refine them into dazzling diamonds. My mindset made me believe that great coaching meant flawless execution, perfect questions, and immediate breakthroughs.

But I was missing something essential. Coaching isn't about shaping others to fit an ideal—it's about selfless service, guiding them to uncover their own brilliance. And just like crafting a diamond, it requires patience, precision, and a deep commitment to the process—without seeking personal gain or recognition.

Selfless coaching means:

- Not rushing transformation—Understanding that breakthroughs come in their own time.
- Not taking credit for growth—Recognizing that the brilliance was always within them.
- Not making it about you—Being fully present, without ego, agenda, or the need to "fix" someone.

Like a diamond cutter who carefully studies the stone before making the first cut, a great coach listens deeply before offering insights.

A jeweler doesn't cut a diamond based on personal preference; they shape it to enhance its natural form. Similarly, selfless coaching isn't about molding someone into what we think they should be—it's about creating space for them to become their most authentic self.

Selfless service in coaching means:

- Asking questions, not giving answers—Helping people find their own truth instead of handing them yours.
- Holding space for discomfort—Allowing them to reflect, & emerge stronger.
- Focusing on impact, not recognition—Understanding that the best coaching often happens in moments that go unnoticed.

A true coach doesn't chase applause. The real reward is seeing someone shine in their own right, knowing you were simply the chisel that helped reveal the brilliance within.

The Pressure that Creates Brilliance

Diamonds form under immense pressure over millions of years. Likewise, real growth often emerges through struggle, resilience, and self-discovery.

As coaches, it's tempting to step in and ease the pressure, to offer solutions that provide quick relief. But true selfless service means trusting the process and allowing the individual to navigate their own challenges.

Transformation isn't about making things easier—it's about helping others find strength in their own pressure points.

True Brilliance Lies in Giving Without Ownership

A diamond cutter never claims ownership over the final gem. Their role is to honor the stone, refine its beauty, and then let it shine on its own.

Selfless coaching is the same. The greatest impact happens when we:

- ↘ Guide without controlling
- ↘ Serve without seeking validation
- ↘ Empower without expecting anything in return

Because in the end, the diamond was never ours to begin with. We are merely the hands that help shape it, with quiet precision and unwavering faith in its brilliance

The Answer Lies Within You!

What does a Coach do to the Coachee?

A COACH CREATES AN EXPERIENCE WHERE COACHEE CAN EXPLORE THEIR THOUGHTS & FEELINGS TO FIND THEIR OWN ANSWERS AND A PATH TO WALK!

On the battle field of Kurukshetra, when Arjuna was distressed in the midst of dilemma of fighting with his own people, Krishna guided and encouraged him to reflect within and overcome his hesitation and fight the righteous war despite the emotional turmoil involved. The Coach also has a similar role to play in the life of a coachee when they are going through a complex or difficult situation.

Krishna used the Bhagavad Gita to explain complex concepts like the nature of the soul, karma, and the importance of selfless action, helping Arjuna understand the deeper meaning behind the war. Similarly, Coach becomes the guiding light for their coachee to help them finding their solutions which lies within them.

Each of us holds the answers within; we need to look deeper into our hearts and ask ourselves what journey we wish to take and what our true priorities are. As Arjuna's charioteer, Krishna strategically positioned the chariot to ensure Arjuna could fight effectively. In the same way, Coach helps you to confront the battlefield of your own emotions, fight with them and successfully come out with a clear and focused path to take.

Like Krishna revealed his universal form to Arjuna in a divine moment, showcasing his divine power and assuring Arjuna of his support. As a Coachee, they may also feel the similar divine moment with their Coach, where the Coach becomes a guiding light, helping them dive deep into the situation to reflect, envision the future, see the difficulties and discover the answers from within.

Do everything you have to do, but not with greed, not with ego, not with lust, not with envy but with love, compassion, humility and devotion.

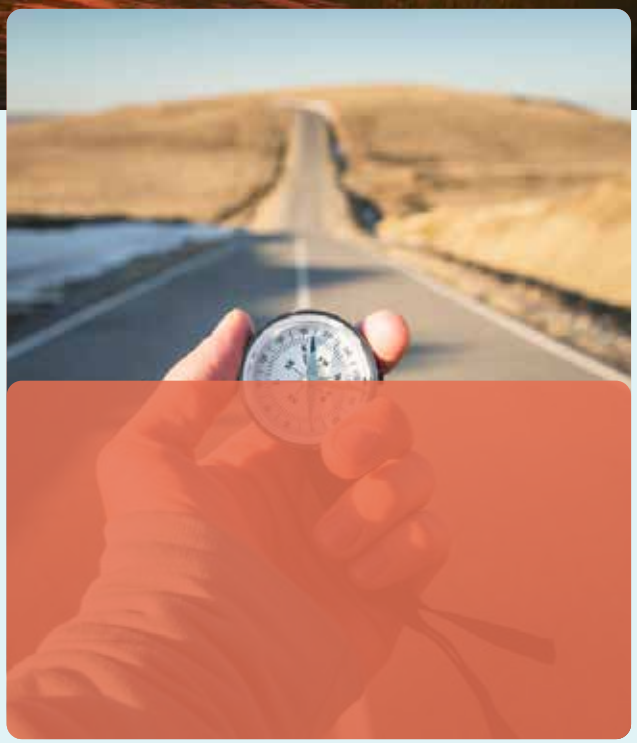

- Lord Krishna, Bhagavad Gita

These emotions help a Coach to be impactful – love, compassion, humility and devotion.

Thanks to my Coach/Mentor for guiding me to dive deep into my heart and find my own answers! We all have a Krishna within us who is always there to guide you, all you need to do is to deep dive into your heart and speak with HIM!

Coaching is A Sculptuing

When I started to thinking about starting career as a life coach and gathering the information about know more of this field and a vast big canvas is coming in front of me.

LIFE COACHING IS THE PROCESS OF HELPING SOMEONE FIND THE PATH BETWEEN WHERE THEY ARE NOW AND WHERE THEY WANT TO BE.

It is about setting and achieving goals in many areas of life including business, health and wellbeing, career, relationships and work-life balance. It can be as broad as wanting to find what will make you happier or as specific as wanting to start a new job. A life coach uses insightful questioning to help their clients identify the goals they want to achieve, recognise their current circumstances, consider all the options open to them and choose which actions they will take within a defined timeframe. Life coaching centres around the belief that everyone can achieve their goals through acknowledging and using their own resources, rather than being told what to do. By providing accountability, empowerment, and targeted support, they enable individuals to bridge the gap between their current reality and their most ambitious aspirations.

Coaching can also help people who aren't sure what they want from life, they're only sure about what they don't want. A skilled coach can help a client consider all areas of their life and narrow down what they want to focus on and what might be holding them back from achieving it. They will also help a client to recognise their strengths and how these can assist them with their goal. This knowledge, combined with working out the values that drive the client, can help set positively framed goals that centre around achieving something rather than avoiding something. And it doesn't stop there. Life coaching will provide clients with the ongoing tools, techniques and strategies to create change and success that actually lasts.

The life coaching is like polishing a rough diamond.

A diamond in the rough is merely a clump of carbon that, given the right circumstances, is able to develop into a high-quality jewel. The official process of manufacturing a diamond consists of various steps that include planning, shaping, applying friction, polishing, and inspecting, all of which can help to remove clumps of carbon and let the diamond shine and glitter with its inner strength. Likewise, a coach also removes clump of various hindrance which dim the light of person. With the help of various strategies, the coach helps the person to shine with his full potentiality.

The life coaching is a journey where the client is walking but the coach is there to help him to find out the right turns and navigate through up and downs of the road to reach his destiny.

For me the coach is a sculpture.

There is a story, once a sculpture was traveling through a forest and he saw a big rock. He stopped there and after long observation he said to his friend, "I want to be here and make a statue out of this rock." Friend agreed and leave him at that place. After some period of time when the friend came and saw a beautiful idol is there instead of rock. With astonished voice he asked the sculpture, "how did you make such beautiful creation?" The sculpture replied that this idol already presents in that rock, I just help it to get out from the rock by removing unnecessary burdens!

The life coach is a sculpture which help the client to become a idol out of rock. The coach is knowing that idol is present there, just need little finishing.

The Celebration Called Life - The Water Cycle

Section 1 - The Setting:

There lived a Treasure hunter who was highly regarded for his accomplishments at a young age. He loved challenges and obstacles that came across his way towards hidden treasures as much as he loved his accolades. In every adventure, he thrived hard to break his records and lift the benchmarking in the treasure-hunting business. There was no such land as "uncharted" in his track record. Fifteen long years of aggressive endeavours had made him the possessor of rare artefacts from forgotten civilizations. His favourite and most precious artefact was the dagger which has "Tólma kaì týchē se akolouthēsei" (Dare, and fortune will follow you) engraved on it.

People called him by names they created based on what they knew or heard about him. "King's Friend", "The Superrich", "Bald Sailor", "Horse Collector", and "People's Champ" were some of his famous names. Though he tasted the power, wealth, and authority that even Kings dreamt of, he felt that he had yet to reach the ultimate treasure. He believed that attaining this would give him fulfilment in his career, but he had no clue about the whereabouts of the "Ultimate Treasure."

Section 2 - The Moment:

After attending a lavish party thrown by his friend "King Valcon – The Third", our treasure hunter was on his way back to his place on an isolated mountain. The road was empty, the clouds were clear, and moonlight lit the path. The mild breeze and the chirping of birds, along with the footsteps of his horse were playing a symphony. The treasure hunter's eyes were heavy with sleep. After a few minutes, he felt a sudden jolt, he almost fell off as his horse halted to a sudden stop. He dismounted his horse with a sense of discomfort and scanned the entire environment around him. He could see anyone or anything. He gently pulled his horse to walk forward, but it refused.

He thought it could be a foul play by the "Snowhill Sorcerers", one of his archrivals. He unsheathed his sword; his eyes widened; his blood rushed to the big muscles, as he swiftly assumed the attack position. He walked up and down the road with his sword ready to strike. After a few minutes, he stood still and sheathed his sword and told his horse "Raptor, my girl, let's go". There is nobody here.

Section 3 - The Clash:

When he was about to mount, Raptor, he heard a faded-chilling voice calling his name from behind. He froze like a statue. His eyebrows rose to their maximum capacity. He felt a shock running through his entire body. It was his real name, which he hadn't heard in a long time, no one knew about it other than his long-gone parents.

In a flash, he unsheathed his sword and took a stealth position behind Raptor and asked with laboured breath "Who Are You?"

The Voice calmly responded, "Hmm...interesting, who are you?". This response triggered the "Treasure Hunter" with rage and anger. He shouted, "You are the one who called my name, and you dare to ask me Who am I". He continued like a shooting canon, "Are you playing silly pranks with me? Do you know who I am?"

The Voice responded rhymingly, "Let me ask you again, who are you?". The treasure hunter lost his cool and roared, "Well, I am the best archer; the best horse rider; the best swordsman with the most kills; the rich dreams of my wealth; the kings want to be my friends; finally, the youngest most accomplished treasure hunter, the mankind has ever seen". There was silence after the roaring faded out. He heard nothing but his heavy breaths.

The Voice said, "Impressive", and asked, "Can you tell me who you are without all the things you mentioned about yourself." The treasure hunter was stunned by the question, he tried, stammered, "I...I...I". But he couldn't give a response immediately. This made him feel more annoyed and he erupted with rage, "What do you need?" and slashed the air with his six feet sword, and dared the voice, "If you don't show up, I will find you and send you to hell. Reveal yourself NOW."

Section 4 - The Click:

The voice with a harmless smile, "Isn't it you who need something? Deep down seeking something called the ultimate treasure to attain fulfilment."

The treasure hunter planted his sword vertically on the ground; bent down his head; took deep breaths; walked towards a rock under the nearby banyan tree; sat on it; adjusted himself to a comfortable position; looked up at the sky; thought deeply for a few minutes and responded, "Yes, that is what I feel like a missing piece in my life. I feel stuck as I don't know where to go to find the Ultimate Treasure.

The Voice responded with relief, "Now we are talking. Neither do I know the definite path to the ultimate treasure". (Took a pause; clicked its tongue and continued) "Maybe.... May be... I could help you see it".

Treasure hunter with disbelief; shook his head sideways; took a pause and asked with curiosity, "Could you do it?".

The Voice: Yes, if you may allow me to ask a few questions TH (Treasure Hunter): That's fine, shoot your questions at me

The voice: (With mild laughter) Oh no... I am not the best archer to shoot anything at you. Just a few points to ponder.

Section 5- The Conversation:

TH: Hmmm... Go on

Voice: Who are you?

TH: Again?

Voice: Yes, who are you?

TH: The best treasure hunter in the world

Voice: What does it mean to you?

TH: Pride, and more Pride

Voice: Hmm...Let's take a deep dive into it. Why is Pride important to you?

TH: It gives me a certain amount of satisfaction

Voice: Hmmm... "Certain" is relative. Can you please help me understand how satisfied are you in your life on a scale of of 1 to 10?

TH: (Took a pause...) Maybe 7

Voice: Voilà. There we are. Hmmm... Could you please tell me what could cause "The missing 3" on the scale?

TH: (Sighs...turned his head to his left; darted his eyes; thought deeply) lack of rest (Pause)... Perhaps, Less anger...(took a longer pause)...Fear..(exclaimed)

Voice: Wonderful. Tell me more. I am curious!

TH: I am constantly on a treasure hunt to be at the top of the list which drains me; I react harshly and fiercely to my triggers such as people's behaviour, and uncomfortable situations; I have a fear of losing my titles and status; I get disturbed because of all these which most of the times takes away deep sleep from me. (his voice faded out to deep silence)

Voice: (After a few seconds) Impressive... hmmm... How could you handle this?

TH: I tried, but I couldn't help myself. I kind of gave up (Took a deep breath)

Section 6- The 49 Days:

Voice: Calm down my dear friend. There could be a solution. But you must allow me to invite you to do an activity.

TH: (With a suspicious and deep tone) That's something I didn't expect. I am interested. What should I do?

Voice: For the next 49 days, whenever you experience your triggers and emotions that disturb your peace, come to the banyan tree and pluck a leaf from the bottom right branch. A leaf for every such experience. Once you plucked a leaf, sit under the banyan tree, and simply ask this yourself. WHY? Bye, bye my dear friend...I will see you at the same place on the 50th day. (Voice faded out into the air)

Treasure Hunter started doing what "The Voice" asked him to do and followed the exact process for the next 49 days.

Section 7- The Ultimate Treasure:

Treasure hunter was waiting for "The Voice" with so much excitement yet in a composed and calm state.

Voice: Hello, my dear Treasure Hunter

TH: Hi, welcome back. I can't wait to tell you what I have discovered.

Voice: Interesting. Let me guess.... Another Gold Mine?

TH: No. It is something about me and myself.

Voice: Beautiful. I have all the time for you. Please don't stop. Tell me more.

TH: I completed the task mechanically for the first few days. I later realized that I gained a little more clarity about myself for each leaf and every why.

Voice: Incredible. Trust me, I got goosebumps. Continue places.

TH: While answering every WHYs, I could see a pattern. I could connect the pattern and figure out a connection between my triggers, emotions and fear. They emerge from my ego. (Exclaimed)

Voice: Here we go! Keep going...

TH: I learnt that my ego needed me not to lose to anyone and in any situation. I felt that I was held captive by "My Pride" unnecessarily and my ego fed on my pride. Thus, the vicious cycle of stuckness and an artificially induced sense of collecting more and more Pride endlessly. In the last 10 days, I became more aware of my ego and consciously reduced its grip on myself. This practice made me calm and I experienced my natural self without any need to be alarmed to protect my pride. (gesturing in the quotes with his fingers)

Voice: What an experience!! What have you gained out of it?

TH: (Without thinking for a second) PEACE, I feel more peaceful.

Voice: Hmm...tell me more about it

TH: I feel contented

Voice: More please...

TH: I feel fulfilled (Took a sudden pause; looked in the direction of the voice; sighed in disbelief; visualised what he told "The Voice" on day one; Stammered) This is what I needed. This is what I was seeking. (Stoop up rapidly; walked up and down) Now I have got it without taking up a voyage to hunt treasures. How? (shook his head again in disbelief; Asked with curiosity) How?!!

Voice: (Contended laugh) No, you did go on a treasure-hunting mission. (Took a pause). Not, in the...

TH: (Interrupted and completed the sentence) Outer world, but within me. (took a pause... Smiled with a sense of enlightenment)

Voice: And Could you find the treasure? Don't stop! the suspense would kill me.

TH: Yes, yes...Enhanced awareness about myself.

(Both observed silence for the next few minutes)

Voice: Is that all....

TH: No, the journey I endeavoured within myself has gifted me something no other missions could ever give me. The more refined and better version of myself. Also, I enjoyed the satisfaction every time I was able to be aware of my ego regulated my behaviour and got more grounded. My man, it was quite a tough fight with my ego. I almost felt like fighting a superpower. With this newly gained self-awareness, I shall handle any difficult situation with focus, calmness and ease.

The Treasure hunter Took a long pause.... Stood still.... knelt...Bowed his head with respect and told he voice, "Thank you.... Thank you for the Ultimate Treasure"

Section 8- The Journey Begins:

Voice: Please stand up my dear friend, I didn't give you anything. The treasure has been within you all the time, waiting for you to find it. All I did was have a small conversation with you.

TH: Exclaimed!! What a diving energy you are!!

Voice: (Laughed out loud)...I am NOTHING. Okay, it's time for our farewell. Explore the treasure. All I could say I you just started scraping the surface of your abundant treasure. Let the "Eternal Energy" be kind to you...

TH: (Yelled) Wait, wait!! Don't leave yet. What about the leaf plucking?

Voice: Oh, my Eternal Energy!! I almost forgot to tell you about it. Please walk 10 meters away from the tree, look at it and tell me what you see.

TH: (Shocked at the sight...The entire branch looked barren without a single leaf on it). The magnanimous tree looks incomplete. No leaves, flowers, birds...

Voice: hmmm.... anything else?

TH: (Stammered) It...it...it needs healing.

Voice: Impressive. What is your reflection on yourself from this lesson?

TH: I am getting it. I too needed healing from the damage I caused to myself. Now, I am getting healed as I have started moving towards my better self. I feel harmonious. Voice: Hip hip hurray to the world's best....

TH: (Rapidly interrupted and completed the sentence with a decreasing pace) No...A simple human being...A rookie on his journey of self-discovery...

Voice: Euge! (Well done in Latin). (Took a pause. Passed a ray on the barren branch and healed it Both were looking at the complete tree at its full glory with life forms sheltered on it) Take care of yourself) "Until next time, my dear, Raja."

Raja: Wait!! Where are you going?

Voice: Hmmm...There are so many like you out there, looking for treasures. I have to just have a conversation with them.

Raja: May I join the journey?

Voice: (With a satisfied smile) Your journey began the day we met!! Happy treasure hunting my dear fellow traveller.

"The Voice" faded out into the horizon.

Core Values as the Compass of Coaching

Coaching is a conversation, a journey to uplift, It sparks new energies and gives a perspective shift.

It says, 'Have trust, let go of the doubt, Break all your limits, and let your strength shine out.

It's not a game of time, it's a game of vibration, Where you guide others toward ransformation.

It says you should keep yourself present, curious like a kid, Yet detach from outcomes, and remain open like a lid.

It says fail, fail again, and fail faster,

With that, you will surely become better.

Have the 'Seva Bhav' for the other person, Set their heart free and listen with compassion.

It says be the container of trust for the other person,

But make sure you have the right intentions.

No validation, no judgment, no ego, no title, Coaching shapes you into a version more vital.

It's an intrinsic journey, so keep reflecting on yourself,

Have humility, respect & kindness like a candle on the shelf.

You have to learn, unlearn & relearn a lot, You need to let your identity evolve.

Your job is to hold the space, Look at the holistic view and silence to embrace.

It says everything is perception, Shift your lens to see what's your own reflection.

When you ask the right questions, You light up the way, clearing all confusions.

Some see it as a bridge, some as a mirror, some as a GPS, while others call it an architect's pillar.

Some compare it to a sculptor or a pottery maker, but I see it as Core Values—the true path-shaper.

Like a coaching compass, these values offer clarity, bringing alignment with purpose and authenticity. They provide direction toward the vision so bright, empowering us to walk the path with light.

Of Affirmations and Curiosity

I have always been a curious soul. Recently I've been experimenting with anchoring my curiosity in affirmations. Affirmations help me curb the unnecessary anxiety, negative thought patterns or re-set my perspective. The thing is, these affirmation at times do not feel very genuine. I have always spoken of decision-making being binary, in YES or NO until I found the magical 'RELATE'. It has given me the legitimacy of my affirmation and allowed me to see through the vision and purpose of the decision. It has put me on the right plain of acceptance without pushing or forcing me from negative to positive.

As a facilitator and coach, I've noticed a societal addiction to positivity. It's so deeply ingrained that many people wear it like a mask—a defence mechanism rather than a mindset. Digging beneath this surface requires patience, skill, and the ability to ask: What are we avoiding when we insist on forced optimism?

1. Are we afraid of complexity?

2. Do we resist acknowledging our doubts?

3. Have we stopped being curious about our choices?

Truth is, our dreamworld of positive thinking often overlooks the very real struggles that shape us. This is where curiosity becomes a powerful ally, led by its greatest guide: WHAT IF.

So here is how my 'Affirmation' has changed over the years –

1. Curious as a Child –

Are you a child at heart, try being curious like one. This filter helps me see the same thing again and again, with a unique perspective.

2. Believe in Magic as a Child –

Magicians are like God to a child and Fraud to an adult. I have stopped limiting my curiosity and leashing it with 'Legitimacy'. I introduce What If before any Yes or No.

3. Be in peace with yourself as a Child –

A Child always has a trust system and takes every step believing in it. I have created a network that allows me to fail and fail again. My 'Trust Warriors' give me the right amount of stress in form of feedback and forward. (You need to attract and accept the last part!)

4. There is always a 'NEW' –

I am building all the three capabilities mentioned above and allowing vulnerability to flow. I think it has made others curious about me immediately breaking ice and forming bonds. I am ok, you are ok!

Reaching mental neutrality is not easy—it requires accepting our flaws without self-judgment. But I've found joy in crafting practical, purposeful affirmations. Allowing myself to look into the mirror and be ok with the image.

What are your thoughts? How do you balance positivity with authenticity? Drop your insights in the comments!

The Coach, Philosopher & Friend

I recently entered the coaching world after years of watching it from a distance. Today this looks a natural progression for me in my journey of self growth and connect with the larger world.

Coach for me is the "Navigator" in any journey, one who travels with you not as a co-passenger but only to facilitate your preparations so that you successfully reach the selected destination you desired.

I belive this is Art & science both as you deal with people and emotions, keeping youself unaffected and neutral takes a lot of courage and practice.

Getting inside but still remaining outside to ensure you are able to keep focus and remain neutral with ability to see the larger picture you operate.

Working with people and coaching them requires great deal of self realization,acceptance and understanding.

The elements of building trust,contract and probe to help individual navigate the thoughts in making own choices and implement them.

A coach is not a creator / advisor but one who helps if willing to achieve your goals at your pace in a systematic manner.

Coaching is a Journey through Authenticity and Patience

COACHING IS A PROCESS AND A JOURNEY OF FACILITATING THE COACHEE TO GROW AND EXPLORE THE BEST ANSWER FOR THE ISSUES AND CHALLENGES THAT HE/SHE IS FACING OR GOING TO FACE.

It's a process, a journey where one is travelling with another person yet detached just navigating the other person through the ally to grow.

While learning and understanding, I realized the importance of coaching as a self-discovery tool and helping out the coachee in a formal and with scientific process.

This journey of attending the course made me realize that the way I was putting more emphasis only on the performance domain, it is more than the only field of performance. Therefore it was a pleasant surprise to learn that coaching is not only necessary for managing performance but also that as a coach you are helping someone who needs a trigger to think over life relationships future and many more issues, this knowledge makes me happier inside, this is such a broad step where one might be a significant partner in the journey of finding and facilitating someone to find a real value and meaning in life.

The idea was that coaching is a directive process, but I came to know that a coach does need not to be an expert, and it is within the coachee to find out the right answer. A coach is a torch bearer, navigating together to reach the level of awareness of the issue and creating an action plan. This thought process gives a sense that we are following a journey where a sense of personal mastery will never be complete only when you arrive towards a destination to some extent when the person in front of you realizes a purpose in the investment of time.

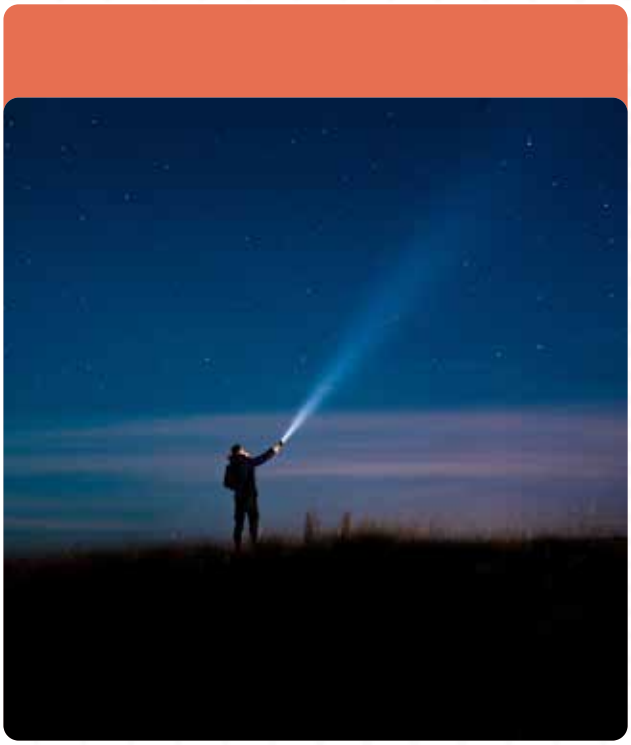

The journey of coaching is insightful, challenging and interesting from unknown to known, from building rapport to building trust, from nowhere to action planning and solving the form of an action plan, and from empathy to detachment, what a paradoxical approach. Overall, coaching becomes important for organizations for leader and oneself, very apt as we see the appreciation for opposite attributes, to become successful as a person and as a leader, one should be assertive and, performance-driven but yet the same self should have patience, collaboration, one is supposed to be no-nonsense person, but you are supposed to manage everything and anything which has to some extent not very sense-making, you may be shy and introvert but you need to be an engaging, risk-taking and fearless person. Effective coaching is a process to discover and create harmony and balance the magic of paradox. Learning also includes that we do require a leader but more than that a good human being.

Coaching : An Untold Journey of Patience and Authenticity

A coach is one who gives space and helps individuals to chart out their journey while helping them on a deeper path, as all resources are within, from a dreamer to find our path as realists and in the journey of achieving dream how wisely the actions are formulated as wise critic. In a way the approach and process are wholistic, it energizes the mind, evokes one's thought processes, and provides an insight towards a solution in a concrete manner, where complete adult learning and implementation happens. I realized a good coach is an empowering person at the cognitive and emotional levels. There can not be a better empowerment than this and you are part of this empowering journey like a true torch bearer.

From rapport building to the action plan, being authentic is the true mantra, one can understand and explore the path jointly carefully if one is authentic, with being real understanding and searching for the real reason and real possible solution both are not feasible, till now a thought always comes to mind looking at workplace practices and culture that sometime authenticity is taken for granted. Thanks to xmonks and Gaurav my belief in authenticity and the importance of authenticity is coming back with a high level of importance, being authentic can lead to such a beautiful exploration. So let us accept, imperfection, weakness and certain threats in such a powerful manner. I got the insight of how I/one should avoid the judgemental approach in the coaching process, I am sure more than understanding the journey of others Coaching is a true journey of being real, giving inner and outer space to oneself and people around you.

This appears to be a process of free-flowing self, where satisfaction to contribution and fulfilment will prevail over all other things, and accepting it humbly fail, fail and fail again and fail faster....there is a big journey awaits...

The Key to the Magic World

> The human brain has 100 billion neurons, each neuron connected to 10,000 other neurons. Sitting on your shoulders is the most complicated object in the known universe.
> - Dr Michio Kaku, Theoretical Physicist

The human brain is a magical world where anything is possible - if one can access it with full awareness. The brain has the ability to change, adapt, and rewire itself by forming new neural connections throughout life. Yet, we often remain trapped in the default settings of our ingrained thoughts, beliefs, and limitations, as if we are hardwired, without making conscious new choices.

Imagine for a Moment

Imagine moving with your spouse and kids into a new neighbourhood which is in the midst of the hustle and bustle of a busy city. A neighbour walks up to you welcoming you into the neighbourhood, and whispers about a secret key in the house - which unlocks the doors to the magic world that is not too far away, where everything is possible. While you were settling down to the not-so-unfamiliar chaos all around, you had to rush back to work even before you could unpack. Stressed, and cursing you are having no choice, you wait for the weekend to set things in order. The weekends have come and gone before you realized, and you were ending up with a never ending list of errands. You started to feel stuck and frustrated that you are too busy, yet nothing much is happening.

YOU CONTINUE TO BELIEVE YOU HAVE NO CHOICE, FORGETTING THAT YOU HAVE THE KEY TO THE MAGIC WORLD. YOU HAVE A CHOICE TO USE IT, BUT YOU DON'T.

What Stops Us from Making the Right Choice?

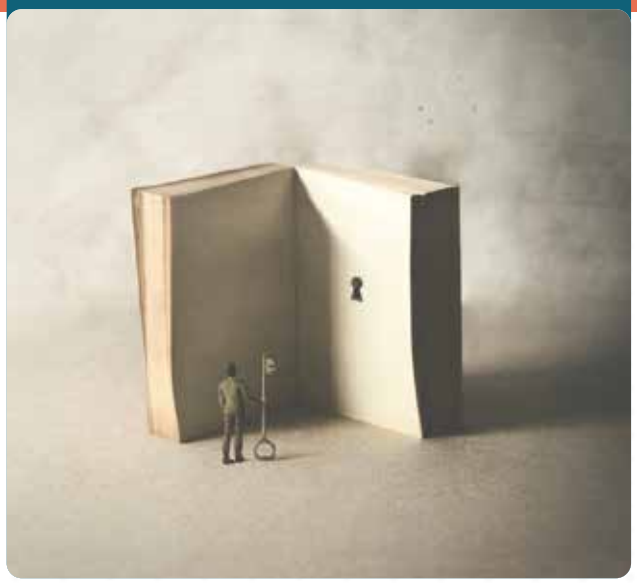

We all have the choice - the choice to step into the magical world of our minds. We would, if only we believed we should and we knew how to.

Our days turn into weeks, weeks into months and months into years, while we perfect the art of the familiar and hone our juggling skills to handle the default situations we are in. When asked how life is, 9 out of 10 people reply saying, 'going on, nothing much exciting'. We do not step into the magic world to explore new possibilities.

Our lack of awareness about our present state prevents us from making the choice. We believe the current state is the default state.

The Role of a Coach

A coach is the key to the magic world. A coach helps unlock this world by creating awareness and a strong urge to step into. A coach guides towards self-discovery through questions rather than instruction. Without giving out direct answers, a coach helps individuals uncover their own insights by facilitating deep thinking, self-awareness, and commitment towards self. The key can never open the lock by itself unless someone uses it. Similarly, a coach can never offer a solution to anyone, unless they travel the path of becoming aware of the solution by themselves through the coach.

As essential and as powerful as it is, a key is just a key. It will be the same and function the same in the hands of anyone holding it, as long as it is inserted into the correct lock. To be held by the individual long enough, and holding that space, until they discover the exact combination to unlock would be the primary function of the coach.

The key does not respond, behave or act as per the individual holding it, and will remain the same for anyone. Similarly, a coach is meant to be non-judgemental and unbiased in their interactions, ensuring that their own past experiences, beliefs, and knowledge do not influence the conversation.

For a coaching session to be truly effective, the coach's individual identity must cease to exist. Only then can they serve as the key that empowers individuals to unlock the door to their own magical world.

Everything has seasons, and we have to be able to recognize when something's time has passed and be able to move into the next season. Everything that is alive requires pruning as well, which is a great metaphor for endings.
